Maurice was transferred to the Military Hospital in Ostend for further rehabilitation, drawing a poignant parallel to his ancestor Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), who had died in Ostend in 1604. Maurice eventually regained his health but would ultimately succumb to the long-term consequences of his injuries in 2015, passing away in a Ghent hospital where several of his ancestors had also died in the 17th century.

Dr. Guido Baekelandt, who performed the life-saving surgery, was the son of Leon Baekelandt and Mrs. Germana Declercq[8]. Leon Baekelandt, a flax trader from Gullegem, was André Baekelandt's brother and acquainted with Michel Declercq (DC15). Guido Baekelandt was born in Gullegem on April 9, 1931, ten years earlier than Maurice, and he died on May 10, 2019, in Figure 46.25, one day before Maurice's 78th birthday. He turned 88 years old. Two years after the successful operation, he married Marie Anna Van den Broucke from Kortrijk, one month before Michel Declercq's death.

The four heroes who saved Maurice's life that fateful night were Marcel Declercq (his brother), René Vangheluwe (his future father-in-law), Dr. Philippe Monbaliu (who had delivered him in 1941), and Dr. Guido Baekelandt (nephew of the surgeon who operated on his mother Irma in 1953; and son of a flax merchant acquainted with Michel Declercq).

46.2.7 Summer: his Marriage

Maurice and Nelly have known each other since childhood. The reader will find in Part X that they were distant relatives, and both descend from the Desclergues, namely Maurice paternally, while Nelly through her great-grandmother Marie Louise de Vos.

In particular, Zozyma Verhaeghe, daughter of Marie Louise de Vos and grandmother of Nelly, meddled a lot to arrange the marriage. Their relationship chart is shown in Figure 46.26, while a picture from their engagement period is shown in Figure 46.27.

[7] René is described in Chapter 48.12.1; he would later become Maurice's father-in-law.

[8] Germana Declercq was unrelated to us and born in Deerlijk

Figure 46.37: The death announcement of Janine Sonja Marie-Thérèse Waucquez, wife of Antoine Bekaert, January 13, 1987. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Maurice Declercq and Nelly Maria Vangheluwe married on January 28, 1966 at Deerlijk. The mayor at that time was Albert Windels. The religious wedding was the next day in Ghent, while the wedding feast was in Waregem.

Maurice and Nelly, driven by a shared ambition, decided to delay starting a family until 1975. They were determined to further their careers, build a new home, and relished in the joy of raising the children of their closest relatives in the meantime. A snapshot from this period, displayed in Figure 46.27, captures their contentment. Despite the potential for a larger family, they chose to have only one child, the author of this book, born on December 27, 1975, in Kortrijk. Figure 46.27 also features a picture of Nelly during her pregnancy with the author, a testament to their anticipation and joy.

As this book is a reflection of the past, the author has chosen to primarily focus on the period up to 1975, a time that holds significant importance in Maurice and Nelly's lives. The author's own story, which extends beyond this book's scope, is briefly touched upon, providing glimpses of his life throughout the narrative. Two snapshots from the time shortly after 1975, displayed in Figure 46.27, offer a glimpse into this era. For more pictures, we invite you to explore Chapter 46.3.4.

46.2.8 His Passion for Sports and Fast Cars

Maurice liked endurance sports. From the age of 16, he became a kayaker and rower. He practised this sport on the Kortrijk-Bossuit canal. The canal was not very wide at the time, and there was a tunnel halfway, in Figure 46.28.

The canal enabled shipping between the Scheldt and the Leie, and Bekaert, somewhere halfway in Zwevegem, made fair use of it to ship steel wire. The tunnel ran under a hill near Moen and must have been an attraction. Especially for kayakers and rowers, it was always an adventure to sail through. The author never saw the tunnel because the canal had been modernised and widened by the time he was born.

Maurice also liked cycling very much, but he did not want to wear the typical clothing whence he had an aerodynamic disadvantage. Nevertheless, he liked long-distance routes and enjoyed the fresh air of the countryside very much.

Cars formed yet another passion. Throughout his life, he has always enjoyed driving cars, typically beautiful vehicles. In particular, when he was young, he was indulged by Karmann® sports cars. Later he switched to more classical ones, as in Figure 46.29, and when he was old, his choice was determined by a combination of a classical look with a dynamic engine.

Apart from the hobbies mentioned here and his joy of helping others, the author does not remember other hobbies.

46.2.9 His Passion for Baking Waffles

Maurice liked to eat, but always in moderation. Strangely, he enjoyed eating bread and often experimented with different bakers to search for the best bread.

He also liked to eat soft waffles baked according to an old recipe, as in Figure 46.30, with a massive waffle iron of Vandendriessche from Deerlijk. For that reason, Nelly's grandmother, Zozyma Verhaeghe, gave her waffle iron as a gift to Maurice so that he could bake waffles as often as he wanted. In this way, a naturally born tradition has arisen, and Maurice occasionally baked waffles for visitors, his family, his grandchildren, etc.

It is typical for people to be glorified after death, but in his case, we can unquestionably state that his waffles were legendary even during his lifetime.

Figure 46.38: Maurice Declercq has always been passionate about construction, machinery, and safety. He had achieved a great deal of intuition and work experience by always trying things by himself. He was not afraid to put on dirty clothes and reach the goal. His company elected him twice to reside abroad (in Brazil and China) to establish new production units. Steel wire drawing through dyes with varying diameters is a metalworking process that stretches steel wire by plastic deformation caused by pulling over a curved axis. During the process, the diameter of the wire decreases while its length increases. The process seems simple, but a lot of 'fingerspitzengefühl' is necessary to adjust the wheels along which the wire propagates to spin at the right speed and cause the correct force. Minor errors always cause the wire to break because the forces may surpass the wire's tensile strength and result in substantial production delays. The process often occurs at room temperature but may also occur at high temperatures. The procedure appeared in a large chain of sub-processes to increase efficiency, including cleaning and applying a coating through zinc and plastic coverage electrolysis. Interestingly, the author's father could acoustically check the process's quality because each part produced noise that changed when something went wrong. He often complained about workers who still did not sense that something had gone wrong even after being explained numerous times. Because of quality differences in supplied wires and different applications, including hanging wire, staples, fibers for concrete, or steel cord, the process required constant adjustments and a lot of insight and experience. Supplied wires and end-products needed specific quality testing and sometimes the development of new testing techniques. A passion for fibers had been passed onto Maurice by his father, Michel, who associated fibers with his past in the flax business. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

46.2.10 Acquaintances

Maurice was a man who truly knew how to connect with people from all walks of life. His ability to engage with individuals from every social class was remarkable, and he never hesitated to stop and chat, no matter who he encountered. His modesty and fair speech endeared him to many, earning their admiration and respect. Maurice was a source of wisdom and guidance, always ready with thoughtful advice. If he believed he could assist someone, he made it a priority, either by offering his help or by finding the right person who could.

Every new project allowed Maurice to showcase his enthusiasm, reconnect with old friends, and seek their counsel. His unwavering commitment to these relationships was a testament to his character. His genuine interest in others' opinions was not just a trait but a way of life for him.

Even after his passing, his impact on numerous lives became evident. The author discovered many individuals who, despite not having met him personally, felt a deep connection with him through his father's actions and reputation.

Figures 46.31, 46.32, 46.33, 46.34, 46.35, 46.36 and 46.37, are selected relics of Maurice's old acquaintances; Many others are distributed in other chapters in this book.

46.2.11 His Career

He was a partly self-educated, partly trained professional engineer with many skills. As mentioned earlier, he has also been a Belgian Military Engineering Corps member. He has, above all, always been a good project planner. As already mentioned earlier, the author also very much enjoyed the numerous constructions made together. The author still remembers vividly how, as a child, he heard from his father that televisions would, in the distant future, become as flat as paintings and that cars would be able to run on water.

His career at Bekaert NV in Zwevegem was a significant milestone. As a research engineer, he was at the forefront of innovation, contributing to the development of various steel products. His role also extended to overseeing production units, demonstrating his versatility and hands-on approach. A testament to his love for practical work is shown in Figure 46.38. His most profound passion, however, was farming. He loved watching plants grow and fancied animals. He has continuously struggled with a choice to continue the farming career of his godfather Daniel Lesage, described in Chapter 64.7.12, or continue in the industry.

Finally, he opted for early retirement and has had an exciting life and career in the last 25 years of his experience.

Maurice occasionally enjoyed discussions in good company, as in Figures 46.39.

He detested the rigid mentality of the metal industry and its strict hierarchy, which is found in almost all such sectors worldwide.

46.2.12 His godfather Daniel Lesage

As explained above, Daniel Lesage was the godfather of Maurice, while Rachelle Declercq was the godmother. He received his name from Rachelle's husband, Maurice, and Daniel's father-in-law, Alois.

Daniel Lesage, described in Chapter 64.7.12, was married to Magdalena Meersseman. The couple remained childless and considered Maurice as if he was their son. To Daniel, Maurice was not only his godson, but he was also the son of his brother-in-law, Michel Declercq, through his sister Irma Lesage, but also the past brother-in-law-to-be through Valentine Declercq, who had been Daniel's fiancé in the past, as described in Chapter 64.7.12 and Chapter 44.5.5.

For Maurice, they provided additional safety, which has been very important due to the difficulties he had as a child, such as his mother's death when he was just 12 years old.

Maurice spent almost every summer vacation entirely with Daniel in Moorslede and often visited him during the rest of the year. While he was there, Daniel and Magdalena pampered him and educated him to grasp every possible skill to become a farmer one day. He learned to handle and ride horses, milk cows, grow crops, and enjoy the August sun's fields' splendor.

To Maurice, the regular stays in Moorslede, such as in Figure 46.40, were a welcome alternative to his education at home. At home, life was very hectic with nine children. In Moorslede, he found quietness, peace, warmth, and the world in which his mother had been raised.

During his time in Moorslede, Maurice's interactions extended beyond the Lesage household. He often visited Oscar Lesage's farm in Beselare, where Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens resided, to purchase dairy butter. These visits to the local farms and neighbors added a social dimension to Maurice's life, enriching his experiences in the community.

He also visited the nearby Maesen-Haspeslagh family often.

When the author was born in 1975, Magdalena and Daniel were delighted. Indeed, they finally had a 'grandson.' Unfortunately, Magdalena died when the author was not yet one year old.

Maurice continued to visit Daniel weekly. At some point, Daniel decided to move to a home for older people, but he hated the place. Maurice rescued him after a few years by bringing him to our house in Sint Lodewijk, Deerlijk. Daniel had a perfect time there until his death. We still preserve important, irreplaceable souvenirs of Daniel and Magdalena.

46.2.13 His Son and Grandchildren

As indicated earlier, this book is not about the life of the author and his children. We present the fundamental aspects in Figure 46.41 and provide a vivid portrayal through a series of images scattered throughout this book, such as Figures 46.42, 46.43, 46.44 and 46.45.

46.2.14 Autumn: Happiness

The author observed a profound transformation in his father, Maurice Declercq, who evolved from a less secure individual burdened by childhood traumas, particularly the early death of his parents, into a mature and content human being. This evolution culminated in a life that, by its end, Maurice found to be extraordinarily fulfilling. Although his life was cut short at the age of 74, we remain grateful for the years he was granted, especially considering the near-fatal motorcycle accident described in Chapter 46.2.6.

Life is often a journey of pain, misfortune, and trauma. Yet, if one can reach a state of full maturity, finding peace, harmony, and deep satisfaction, then the journey has been worthwhile. Maurice's life is a testament to this resilience. The birth of his grandchildren brought him serenity, and when his son, the author, embarked on an academic career, Maurice's support and pride were instrumental in the author's success, rekindling the self-confidence that had been eroded in his youth.

Maurice's realization of his family's fragmented history, and his belief that past accomplishments had been forgotten, made the author's genealogical pursuits all the more significant. Maurice's enthusiasm was tangible as he accompanied the author to various town halls, retrieving certificates of recent ancestors and reestablishing his connection with his heritage. These moments, shared several years before his passing, were filled with a sense of pride and joy that resonated with Maurice's deep love for his family and his roots.

Although Maurice is no longer with us to witness the culmination of these genealogical efforts, we are confident that, in some way, he remains aware of the legacy uncovered.

Figures 46.46 and 46.47 capture impressions of Maurice in the last decade of his life, reflecting the contentment and peace he ultimately achieved.

46.3.1 Introduction

She grew up mainly with her grandparents Gerard Vangheluwe and Zozyma Verhaeghe, described in Chapter 48.11, and stems from a family of entrepreneurs.

Her grand-uncle, described in Chapter 48.9.5.4, served four years on the war front, received several Belgian recognitions, and was killed during the final offensive in 1918.

Her great-grandfather, described in Chapter 48.9.2.2, was an architect of the practice and a construction entrepreneur and contributed to the Cinquantenaire in Brussels and the Basilica of Dadizele.

The author's mother's entrepreneurship made her more progressive than her more conservative husband, Maurice.

The tension did not benefit their marriage, and the siblings interfered too much. Life is like a volcano, and growth is never possible without a bit of fire from time to time. However, external souls should try to extinguish a fire with water, not oil. Pouring oil instead of water is what the author has difficulties with forgiving them.

Despite being born in a village, Nelly's entrepreneurship fit better in a town or a city, so she has always leaned towards Kortrijk. She has established more than one company there and had a very successful business in providing book-printing and copy services to the students and other companies at Kortrijk.

As mentioned earlier, the purpose of this book is to write about the past, not the author or his living family. Therefore, a photographic impression of his mother's past life is given rather than a written story. Life continues and is an uninterrupted gathering of stories and experiences.

46.3.2 Her Childhood

Nelly was born in 1945, on May 26. She was delivered by Dr Philippe Monbaliu, just like Maurice Declercq. Later, her family's physician would be Dr De Groote. Impressions of her childhood are shown in Figures 46.48, 46.50, 46.51, 46.52, 46.53, 46.54, 46.55, 46.56, 46.57 and 46.58.

46.3.3 Her Youth

Photographic impressions of her youth are shared in Figures 46.59, 46.60, 46.61 and 46.62.

46.3.4 Her Marriage and Family

We also refer to the pictures in Chapter 46.2.7. The author's parents married on January 28, 1966, at Deerlijk. The church ceremony was in Ghent. Precious memories are shown in Figures 46.63, 46.64, 46.65, 46.66, 46.67, 46.68, 46.69 and 46.70.

46.3.5 Her Career

Her career was introduced above. Sweet memories are shared in Figures 46.71 and 46.72. While a youngster, Nelly also ran a fashion shop at Blankenberge and Ronse. She also established a flourishing restaurant at Nieuwpoort. Her longest career, however,

Dokter Philip MONBALIU
Echtgenoot van wijlen mevrouw Germaine MAELFAIT

°: Lissewege 13 april 1895
+: Deerlijk 15 juni 1999

Papa, pépé, grote pépé, vriend, dokter.
Jij was door veel mensen geliefd. Het deed deugd bij jou te zijn: je had iets heilzaams. Was het je montere humeur om een kwinkslag nooit verlegen, je gulhartigheid of je verbazingwekkende eenvoud? Je had een rijk gemoed en voelde de mensen feilloos aan, zonder veel woorden, de goede verstaander...
De grootheid van je hart deed je veel begrijpen en aanvaarden: mensen met een andere overtuiging, pijnlijke gebeurtenissen in je familie- of vriendenkring, je kon het er allemaal bijnemen zoals het kwam. Je was een echte levenskunstenaar: verdraagzaamheid, aanvaarding, loslaten - voor ons een lastig leerproces -, leken voor jou een heel natuurlijke aangelegenheid. De natuur waarmee je zo verbonden bleef, deed je meedrijven op de stroom van het Leven.
Je bent je leven lang trouw gebleven: trouw aan je afkomst: "Ik ben van den buiten ik ben van den boer", trouw aan de Vader van het leven, trouw aan jezelf.
Omdat je zo goed wist te leven, was je niet bang om te sterven: "Ons Here is mij vergeten" , schertste je vaak. Ook in je laatste dagen, waarin je eenzaam werd, omdat je nog heel slecht hoorde en zag, bleef je dankbaar om de kleine dingen. Klagen stond niet in je woordenboek.
Papa, pépé, grote pépé, vriend, dokter, wij bewaren een dankbare herinnering aan jou in ons hart, je hebt ons veel gegeven. Vaak heb je het zelf niet beseft: jouw manier van zijn was voor ons een zegen.

De familie dankt U voor uw blijken van sympathie en uw gebed.

Nelly's involvement in a Kortrijk theater production of a Brothers Karamazov-based drama, originally written by Dostoevsky, is a fascinating part of her story. In this narrative, a character named Zozyma takes center stage. It's interesting to note that this Zozyma was not a lady like Zozyma Verhaeghe, Nelly's grandmother, but a Russian man.

Figure 46.71: Nelly Vangheluwe, a beloved figure in her hometown of Kortrijk, was renowned for her entrepreneurial spirit, most notably through her cherished business, the Copy House. Over the years, this establishment, also known as Copytheek and Missis Copy, became a haven for students and small businesses alike. It was more than just a place to print and copy; it was a warm, academic-friendly environment where students could study and seek advice. Nelly's Copy House was a cornerstone of the community, fostering a sense of belonging and support.
Students saw Nelly not only as a business owner but also as a mentor and a mother figure. She provided guidance, a listening ear, and a welcoming atmosphere that made Copy House a second home for many. Her genuine love for being around young people and her dedication to their success impacted countless lives.
Nelly's passion for her work extended beyond the personal connections she made. She was deeply fascinated by the technology of photocopying, which, in the 1980s, was both sophisticated and elegantly simple. The process involved a cylindrical drum coated with a photoconductive material that became conductive when exposed to light. This drum, charged at high voltage, would reflect light from white areas of the document, discharging the drum locally. Toner would then adhere to these charged areas and be transferred to electrically charged copy paper, where heat and pressure would fixate it permanently.
Nelly's Copy House was not just a business; it symbolized her dedication to her community and her love for nurturing the minds of the future. Her legacy lives on in the countless students she helped and the warm memories she created in her cozy, inviting print shop. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Nico Felicien Declercq (DC17) & Shirani de Silva

47.1 Introduction

This chapter is deliberately short because the author's life story remains beyond this book's scope, apart from some glimpses.

47.2 Nico Felicien Declercq (DC17)

In an ancestry context, the author can be found in the following chapters: Chapter 47, as a descendant of the Desclergues and the author of this book; Part X; Chapter 64, as the grandson of Irma Helena Lesage; Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2 as a great-great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67 as the grandson of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68 as a 't Kint descendant; Chapter 69 as the great-great-grandson of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71 as the great-great-grandson of Clemens Lammens; and Chapter 72. Furthermore, he is equally referred to in Part XII as Shirani Oluphathage de Silva's husband.

His children Benjamin, Anna-Laura, and Lambert appear in Figure 47.3 and are the ones who can continue this book's long story.

The author is an only son and grew up with his parents, Maurice Declercq (DC16) and Nelly Maria Vangheluwe, his grand-uncle Pierre Vangheluwe, and his great aunt Jeanette Verbrugghe, his foster parents.

Of the numerous places he has visited, Spain is where he feels most at home, which is no wonder given the context of this book. A photo in Spain is shown in Figure 47.4.

47.3 Shirani Olupathage de Silva

She is Belin de Silva's daughter and Peres de Silva's granddaughter. She lost her mother at a very young age and lost her father in 1996. She has Iberian roots and arrived through Goa in Sri Lanka.

She descends from the de Silva family members who established the Uduwara fortress in Sri Lanka around 1600, described in Part XII.

Her most recent ancestors are shown in Figures 47.5 and 47.6.

She is described in Chapter 47 as the author's wife. She is equally referred to, in much detail, in Part XII and also in the following chapters: Part X ; Chapter 64 as granddaughter-in-law of Irma Helena Lesage; Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2 as a great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67 as granddaughter-in-law of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68 as a ' t Kint descendant-in-law; Chapter 69 as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71 as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Clemens Lammens; and Chapter 72 as the wife of the author.

47.4 Youngest Declercq Generation

Figure 47.1: On Valentine's day, 2021, the author, with his wife and family, visited Leuven University. It was great to return to Saint Anthony's chapel near Tiensepoort. Almost 25 years ago, the author contemplated his life there and decided, while being a student, to return to Sri Lanka for a big adventure in 1997, of which his family is the result. Their children took this picture at campus Arenberg during the visit. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Part X

The Maternal Desclergue Ancestry Branch

Chapter 48

The Maternal Desclergue Ancestry Branch beginning with Joana Catharina Declercgz (DC08b) & Joannes De Vos

48.1 Introduction

Here, we describe a second blood-relationship with the Desclergues of Montblanc. Before we continue, we prefer to highlight Chapter 28.5, connecting events in Harelbeke with events in Montblanc.

The paper trail showed that the author descends from the Desclergues through his father and his mother before a DNA investigation was made. The latter confirmed the discovery.

In particular, the maternal ancestry begins with a sister, Joana Catharina Declercgz (DC08b), of Pere Declercgz (DC08), husband of Marie Prienne.

Joana Catharina married Juan Garcia, a soldier at the Spaniard castle of Ghent, in 1676. Later, she married Joannes de Vos in 1685 in Harelbeke. The latter was already of considerable age.

The couple had one son, Petrus de Vos, who survived childhood but was orphaned at 11. He was probably raised by the Maes (or de la Maza) family. He stayed in touch with his Desclergue family through his auntie Maria Declercgz (DC08d), who married Egidius Vandeputte or Du Puich.

48.2 A DNA Investigation

The reader may be interested in checking out Chapter 73.10.3.6 first.

Because Nico F. Declercq's parents are distantly blood-related through their common ancestors Desclergue - de la Cruz, significant traces of this relationship can be retrieved in his DNA. GEDmatch® has a tool[1] to make such investigations by comparing corresponding DNA sequences on chromosome couples. One sequence comes from one parent and the other from the other parent.

Luckily, we have a sample to compare with, namely that of the brother of Shirani de Silva. Their parents had common ancestors around 4-5 generations ago, and we used it as calibration.

We have checked the most extensive sequence of DNA for each chromosome, which appears equal on both pairs. These numbers were then compared between both samples. We obtained the following numbers:

The maximum sequence for Declercq was 562 (chromosome 15), while 3805 (chromosome 3) for de Silva; the minimum of the common sequences for Declercq was 102 (chromosome 16), while 119 for de Silva (chromosome 21); the average sequence for Declercq was 222, while 832 for de Silva.

If we assume that the numbers are, on average, divided by 2 for every subsequent generation, then, as a rough estimate, a common ancestor of Declercq's parents appears around nine generations ago, while for de Silva, approximately 4-5 generations ago.

Indeed, the common ancestors of Declercq's parents lived nine generations ago and were Declercq-de la Cruz. We refer to earlier chapters for the ancestry before Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz. One of their children was Joana Catharina Declergz (DC08b), introduced in Chapter 37.9.3. Her ancestry until Pere Desclergue (DC01) is shown in Figure 48.1.

48.3 Joana Catharina Declercgz (DC08b)

Before reading this chapter, it is crucial to check Chapter 37.9.2, devoted to Maria Declercgz (DC08d) because she and her family stayed connected to the offspring of Joanna Declercgz (DC08b), in Figure 48.3, after her death. Furthermore, Joana's birth and first marriage are described in Chapter 37.9.3.

Joanna Catarina Declercgz (DC08b) was introduced in Chapter 37.9.3. Her baptism is shown in Figure 48.4.

To allow reading the godmother's name on this certificate of 1657, we have taken a mirror image of the backside of the page and performed an overlay experiment. It allowed identification of which lines on the paper were written on Joanna's certificate and the back. Hence, we have concluded that the godmother was Joanna Tila or Joanna De Tila (spelled as 'Tdylaet').[2] We found the family name De Tila in many documents in Spain in the 17th century. Also, the name Edilla is Spanish. Either way, De Tila or Edilla is linked to the Maza family, as seen next.

Note that a Margareta De Tila ('Tylaet') was also a godmother, on baptism in Deerlijk in 1644, in Figure 48.5, to Guilelmus Vercruyce, son of Petrus Vercruyce and Rogeria de Graue or De Grave. The latter family also appears in Figure 48.35 on page 904.

Petrus Vercruyce was either the brother or the father of Martina Vercruyce, as they had the same name and were both of sufficient age in 1644 to be godparents.

An early connection between the de la Cruz family and de Tila is also shown in Figure 37.81 on page 659.

When the Desclergue family fled to Ghent during the French occupation, described in Chapter 34.10, Joana Catharina Declergz (DC08b) married a soldier at the Spaniard Castle. The marriage was in 1676, and the groom was Juan Garcia.

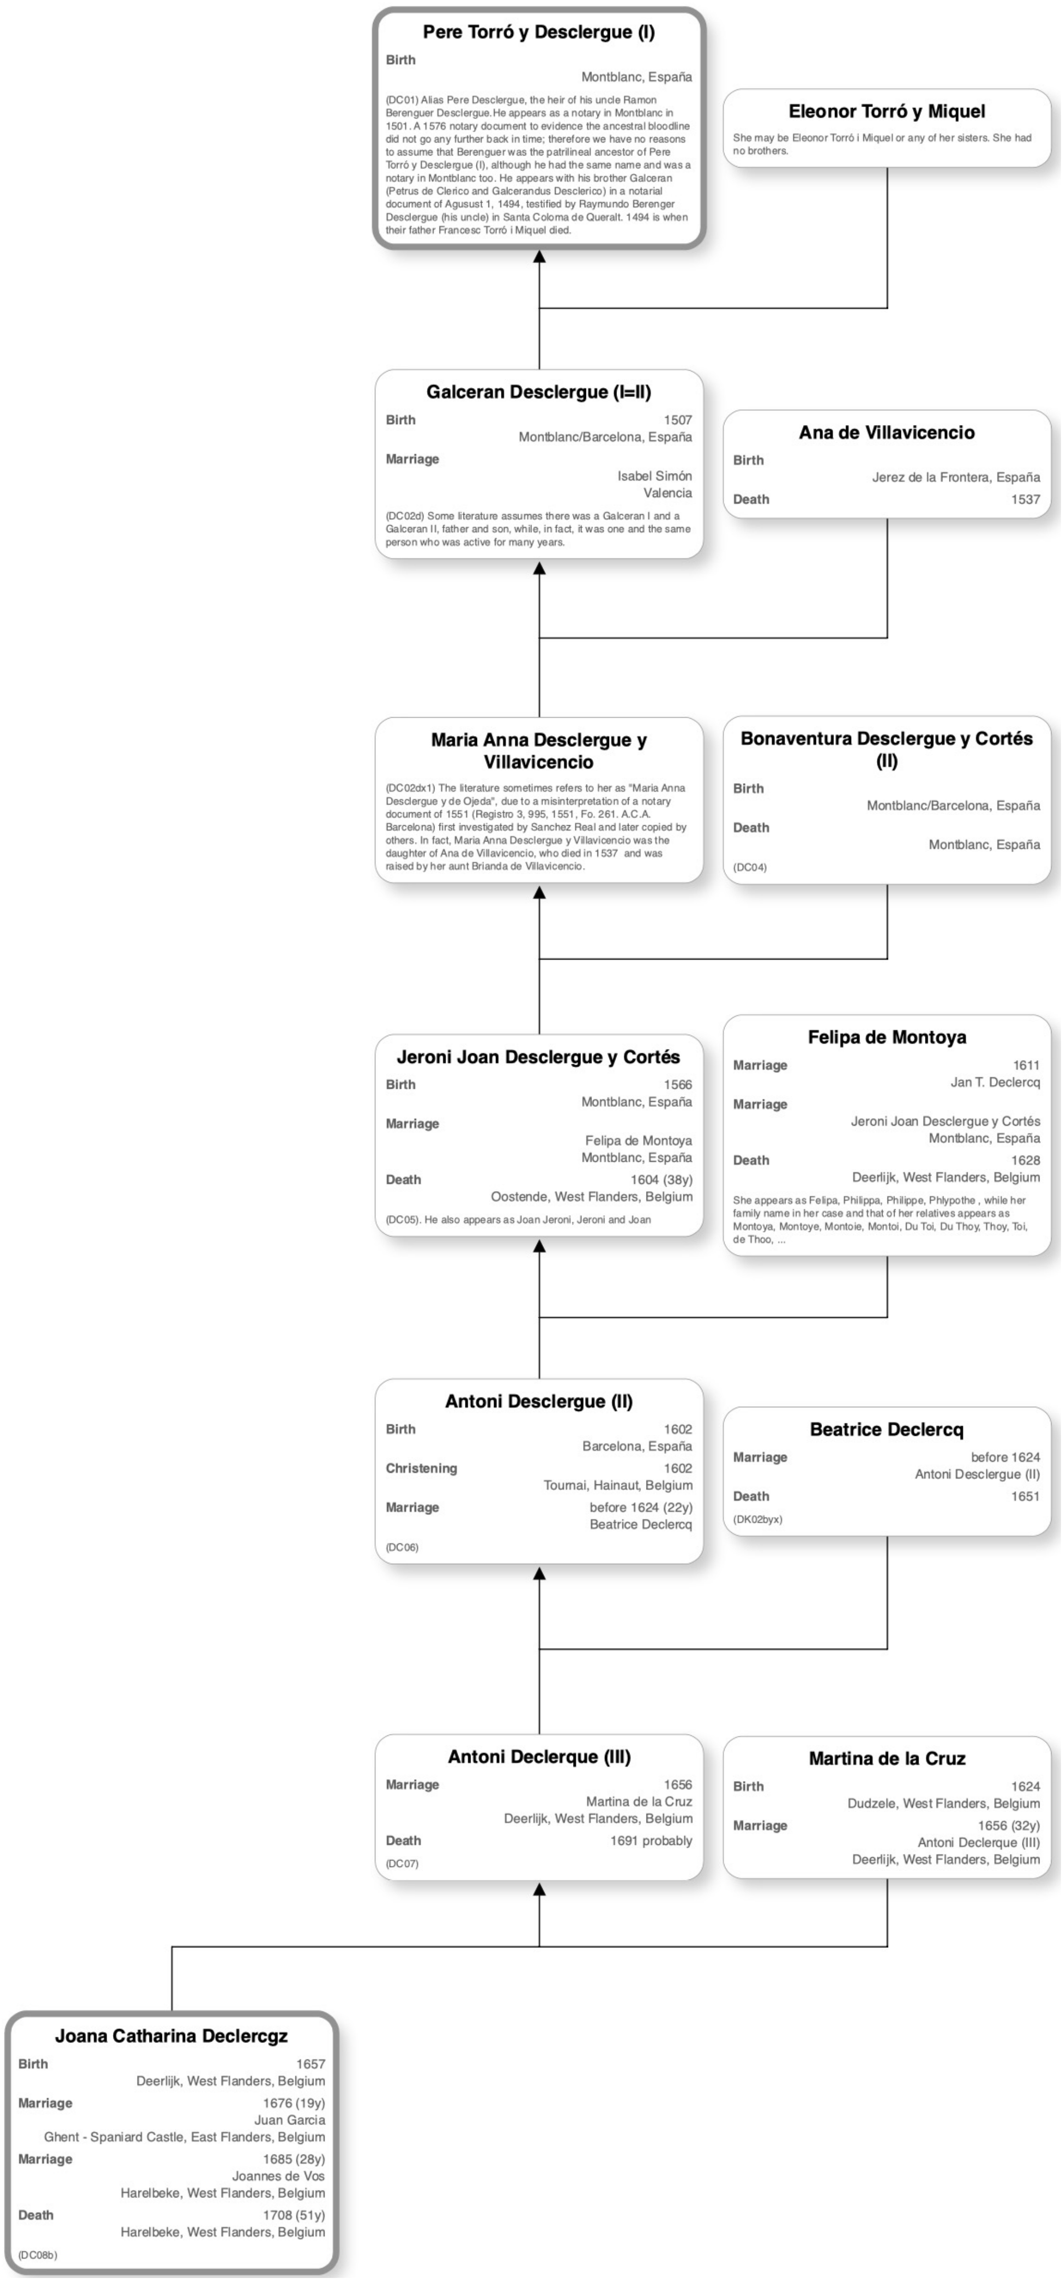
[1] Runs of Homozygosity

[2] In that period, the name Edylaet also appeared and still causes some doubt.



Pere Torró y Desclergue (I)
Birth
Montblanc, España
(DC01) Alias Pere Desclergue, the heir of his uncle Ramon Berenguer Desclergue.He appears as a notary in Montblanc in 1501. A 1576 notary document to evidence the ancestral bloodline did not go any further back in time; therefore we have no reasons to assume that Berenguer was the patrilineal ancestor of Pere Torró y Desclergue (I), although he had the same name and was a notary in Montblanc too. He appears with his brother Galceran (Petrus de Clerico and Galcerandus Desclerico) in a notarial document of Agusust 1, 1494, testified by Raymundo Berenger Desclergue (his uncle) in Santa Coloma de Queralt. 1494 is when their father Francesc Torró i Miquel died.

Ana de Villavicencio
Birth
Jerez de la Frontera, España
Death 1537

Maria Anna Desclergue y Villavicencio
(DC02dx1) The literature sometimes refers to her as "Maria Anna Desclergue y de Ojeda", due to a misinterpretation of a notary document of 1551 (Registro 3, 995, 1551, Fo. 261. A.C.A. Barcelona) first investigated by Sanchez Real and later copied by others. In fact, Maria Anna Desclergue y Villavicencio was the daughter of Ana de Villavicencio, who died in 1537 and was raised by her aunt Brianda de Villavicencio.

(DC01) Alias Pere Desclergue, the heir of his uncle Ramon Berenguer Desclergue.He appears as a notary in Montblanc in 1501. A 1576 notary document to evidence the ancestral bloodline did not go any further back in time; therefore we have no reasons to assume that Berenguer was the patrilineal ancestor of Pere Torró y Desclergue (I), although he had the same name and was a notary in Montblanc too. He appears with his brother Galceran (Petrus de Clerico and Galcerandus Desclerico) in a notarial document of Agusust 1, 1494, testified by Raymundo Berenger Desclergue (his uncle) in Santa Coloma de Queralt. 1494 is when their father Francesc Torró i Miquel died.

Maria Ana Cortés de Monroy y Vega Bazán
She appears one time as Catharina Desclergue in a document in 1576 (Montblanc) in which it would have been harmful to reveal her true identity being a Cortés. The same document also hides the ancestry before Pere Desclergue, although it mentions that Pere Desclergue was important and respected and was buried in the Monastery of Montblanc ... which means that his ancestry cannot have been unknown. In 1599, the family again used its full name, i.e. Desclergue i Cortés, as the political landscape in 1599 permitted it. Because she was of higher nobility than the rest of the ancestry tree, her descendants would proudly want to be referred to as Desclergue y Cortés.

(DC02dx1) The literature sometimes refers to her as "Maria Anna Desclergue y de Ojeda", due to a misinterpretation of a notary document of 1551 (Registro 3, 995, 1551, Fo. 261. A.C.A. Barcelona) first investigated by Sanchez Real and later copied by others. In fact, Maria Anna Desclergue y Villavicencio was the daughter of Ana de Villavicencio, who died in 1537 and was raised by her aunt Brianda de Villavicencio.

The life of a soldier was hazardous. After his death, she married Joannes de Vos, a widower, in 1685 at Harelbeke. Joana Catharina Declergz (DC08b) was born in Harelbeke in 1657 and died there in 1708, in Figure 48.6.

48.3.1 Early Link Between Desclergue and de Vos

There was a connection between the Declercq branch of our family and the de Vos family that predated the marriage of Joanna Catharina Declercgz and Joannes de Vos.

Indeed, in Figure 34.256 on page 611, we see that Nicolas Declercq was acquainted with Petrus Laurentius De Vos in 1621. The families Declercq and De Vos would later merge through Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), cousin of Nicolas Declercq, through the marriage, in 1685, of Joanna Catharina Declercgz, the daughter of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz, with Joannes de Vos, the son of Petrus Laurentius de Vos and Isabella Verscheure.

48.3.2 Link Between Desclergue, De Vos and Maes (Mas / de la Maza)

Raymond Fagel[3] describes how several Spanish and their families had become Bourgeois or Bourgeois Forain ('Burgher' and 'Outside Burgher,' or 'Poorter' and Buitenpoorter') already in the 16th century and consider it as an act of integration. The book even mentions families with such ties from early in the 16th century:

Interestingly, the book also states that merchants from the Netherlands went to Spain in the 15th and 16th centuries. Therefore, it may only sometimes be clear if someone was from Flanders but resided in Spain or if someone in Flanders, from Spain, had earlier roots in Flanders. Nevertheless, the book shows, among many other interesting aspects, such as Flemish participation in the trade with the Americas, that family names were smoothly transformed from one language to the other and vice versa, such as, for instance, 'Van Hoof' which became 'De Cortés' because the latter existed in Spain. Perhaps a compelling case is that of a merchant 'de la Fosa,' which in Dutch would quickly transform to 'De Vos.' The same would be true for 'De Poch.' Genetic evidence of such transformations is found in Chapter 73.10.3.6. It is found in Chapter 29.8.5 that there are secure connections with, for instance, the families De Vos and Maes (Mas / de la Maza) and that the specific persons appearing are probably of Spanish descent.

Therefore, perhaps some are Spanish and of old Flemish origins; it is impossible to tell. The fact is that they were tightly connected with the Spanish.

Numerous sources confirm that there were many connections between Flanders and Spain through merchants from Flanders visiting or even residing in Spain and vice versa.

W.P. Blockmans and Walter Prevenier[4] describe how international communities, small in number, formed elite members of the Flemish society in several cities. In Antwerp around 1560 AD, there were around 1100 foreign merchants with a total population of approximately 100000; 450 were Spaniards and Portuguese, 200 Italian, 300 German, 100 French, and 50 English.

The same book also states that even before, more precisely around 1422 and 1462, Portuguese and Castilian skippers had disputes with each other.

The book also mentions that, typically, foreign merchants did not integrate except the Iberians. Iberians usually married local women. They continued this tradition worldwide, as can also be seen, for instance, in India, Sri Lanka (described in Chapter 54.8), Brazil, and all other places where Portuguese and Spanish merchants, military, and governors arrived.

In 1590, in Figure 48.7, we found Petrus Laurentius de Vos ('Laurentius de Vos') as godfather to the son of a Spanish-Catalan individual, Pau Cortillo ('Paulus Lindenhove').

In 1607 (April 14, folio 179), Petrus Laurentius de Vos married Maria de la Maza (I) at Veurne (Sint Walbruga). Maria de la Maza (I) was the daughter of Guillermo de la Maza. Witnesses were Joan de la Maza and Joanna Fierens. The certificate is shown in Figure 48.19.

On April 20, 1610, at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent in Figure 48.8, Antoni Mas married Clara Fabinagon. The groom was from Terrassa near Barcelona, while the bride was from Antwerp ('Amberes'). The groom's parents were Antonio Mas and Catalina, and the bride's parents, Francisco Fabina and Catalina.

In Figure 48.9, we found a wedding in Harelbeke of Ameye, with merchant Antoni Mas ('Antheunis Mercatoro Maes') as a witness. The family name Ameye existed locally, but also in Spain, typically spelled as 'Amaya.'

We found a baptism at Harelbeke of Maria de la Maza (II) in 1613, in Figure 48.10, daughter of merchant Antoni de la Maza. The godfather was Domingo Canonico de la Maza, and the godmother was Maria, the mother's sister.

Geneanet® provides a document of a wedding on December 9, 1646, in the Parroquia de Santa Maria de la Asunción of Laredo, Cantabria, of Maria De Tila de la Maza (III), with Felipe Rosillo Hoyo. The parents of Maria De Tila de la Maza (III) were Diego De Tila Muñoz and Maria de la Maza (IV). We know that the children of Maria Maza (IV) and Diego De Tila were born between 1630 and 1644, and she had godchildren between 1639 and 1662 in Spain.

We need more information to identify Maria de la Maza (I, II, III, IV). However, a likely scenario is that Antonio, Guillermo, Domingo Canonico, Joan, and Maria (IV) were siblings. Maria (IV) remained in Spain and married Diego De Tila Munôs. They had a daughter, Maria (III), who married in 1646 to Felipe Hoyo. Antonio was married to a sister of a particular Maria; they had a daughter at Harelbeke in 1613, Maria (II), and Domingo Canonico served as godfather together with Maria, sister of the mother. Guillermo had a daughter, Maria (I), at Veurne in 1607; his sister Joan was the godmother.

Perhaps Joanna De Tila was a sister of Diego De Tila and was linked to the Maza family, which was linked to de Vos and Desclergue. We found a Domingo de la Maza, on a document of Geneanet®, who married Catalina De Manzinas on February 9, 1634, in the Cathedral of Valladolid in Spain.

On February 4, 1634, in Figure 48.11, we found a marriage between Diego de Vossa, a sergeant in the Company of Don Gaspar de Valdes, and Clara Castro. The witnesses were alferes Manriques (see also Chapter 29.5.4), in whose company, early on, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Carlos Coloma de Saa had been military, and Juan Ruiz, known as the verger of the church.

We found a baptism in Deerlijk in 1644, in Figure 48.12, where the Priest wrote DeClercq and then changed his mind and wrote Maes. We are not sure who was at this event, but it may indicate that Declercqs and Maes families were present during the baptism; therefore, the Priest was confused.

We must warn anyone searching for certificates that confusion between our Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his step-family Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1) is imminent. The latter was married to Elizabeth de Laere and was a son of Jan Declercq (DK03dya) and Jossina Nooters. Jan Declercq (DK03dya) was Antoni's (DC06) stepbrother. This step-family is described in Chapter 34.13.7. In the 1640s, we see Antonius and Elizabeth Declercq-de Laere appearing a couple of times at baptisms for the children of Joannes Maes and Joanna Payge or Page. Hence, we assume that there were several Maes families in the area. We refer to Figures 48.13 and 48.14.

Apart from the possible links with Maes or Maza and indications of Spanish connections in this realm, we know that, much later, our Joana Declercgz (DC08b), daughter of Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina Vercruyce / De la Cruz, married Joan de Vos in 1685 and that she would die in 1708 at Harelbeke. We have found indications of a Spanish link for all mentioned persons and events, as read below.

Desclergue and De Vos (or perhaps 'Poch' or 'de Poch') had old links.

Indeed, in 1607 (April 14, folio 179, shown in Figure 48.19), Petrus Laurentius de Vos married Maria Maes at Veurne (Sint Walbruga).

Several documents reveal that Joanna Declercgz (DC08b) had connections with the Maes family, and it is even almost sure that her son Petrus De Vos (DC08by2) grew up with the Maes family after he was orphaned, as can be seen later.

Petrus Laurentius de Vos married again at Harelbeke in 1632, on May 4, to Isabella Vanderscheure in Figure 48.21; witnesses were Petrus De Vos and Petrus Van der Gracht.

This marriage would result in a son, Joannes De Vos, in 1633, who married Joana Declercgz (DC08b) in 1685 in a second marriage.

We must here also repeat that Joana's sister, Maria Declergz (DC08d), born at Deerlijk in 1665, married Egidius Vandeputte (Du Puich) in 1701 and that this Vandeputte (Du Puich) was likely linked to the Desclergue family through Beatriz de Pinto on the one hand, and the construction of the Chapel in Deerlijk, described in Chapter 49, on the other.

A Spanish family in Belgium with only a few members, namely in Bruges and Harelbeke, carried the name 'de Cerezo y Burke.'

In Harelbeke, we found a baptism of Joanes Bryche in 1616, son of Natalis from the restaurant (camponis) to whom Joan de la Maza ('Joannes Maes') served as godfather.

In Bruges, this family appears at the baptism of Anna De Cerezo y Burke ('Anna Decereso, geseit Bryche'), daughter of Joan De Cerezo y Burke ('Joannes Decereso, geseit Bryche'), in 1620. Her godfather was Joan de Cereso, and her godmother was Anna Coucke. We refer to Figures 48.15, 48.16, 48.17 and 48.18.

Note that Figure 48.18 is evidence that Laurentius De Vos worked for the Spanish regime in Flanders because he was censitor; in other words, he was a tax collector.

More paper trails are shown in Figures 48.19 and 48.20.

In Pittem-Wingene-Tielt, the De Vos family probably became acquainted with the Declercq family, or even sooner, back in Spain. The De Vos family will also link to Pedrolo y Desclergue; see further.

Despite the local appearance of the family name 'Maes,' we should remember that certain appearances may have been of Spanish origins, such as 'Mas' from the Barcelona area, and even French, where 'Masse' also existed. We found conclusive evidence, neither pro nor contra.

In fact, at the baptism of Joanna De Vos, we see De Tila as a godmother.

In Cantabria, we also found a married couple, De Tila-Maza. It may be that the godmother De Tila was related to Maria Maza.

Note that, e.g., in Kortrijk, we also find Massa/Masse/Mazza as a family name during the period when many Spanish soldiers resided in and around the town; examples are Anthonia Masse (godmother to Maria Hubble, January 8 1592, Kortrijk, baptisms Saint Martin) and Joannes Masse (godfather to Joannes O' Brien, April 28 1594, Kortrijk, baptisms Saint Martin).

Hence, there is definitely a link at Kortrijk between Massa/Mas/Masse and foreigners.

For instance, Francesc de Mazza appears on baptism certificates at Antwerp (San Felipe de la Castile) in the early 1600s, and Pedro de Masa appears on a wedding certificate there.

Petrus Laurentius de Vos had already been married once at Harelbeke, so he must have married at least thrice.

Indeed, in 1625 and 1629, we have found two baptisms of children of Petrus Laurentius de Vos and Catarina Vanbaelberghe, namely Petrus De Vos (Harelbeke, September 19, 1625, the godfather was Petrus De Vos, godmother was illisible Degrybenaek) and Maria De Vos (Harelbeke, October 1, 1629, godparents not mentioned). His third marriage is shown in Figure 48.21.

48.3.3 The Vercruyce and Van der Gracht Families in a Record of King Felipe IV of Spain

In the documents related to the marriage and family of Declercq and De Vos, in Deerlijk-Harelbeke-Hulste, we observe the appearance of Charles Vercruyce and Petrus Van der Gracht.

For instance, the latter family was historically significant in our region, as shown in Figure 48.22. How are these persons linked to each other? They may be connected through King Philippe IV of Spain (Felipe IV). We cannot be sure about the identity of the persons below.

Nevertheless, it is noteworthy to mention the following discovery. We found an interesting document at Lille[5]

'Registre des rémissions des années XVIe cinquante sept, cinquante buicet (huit) et XVIe cinquante neuf. Lettres de relief d' appel accordées par le roi Philippe IV à Charles Vercruyce ('Vander Cruyce') (Bruges), Pierre Van der Gracht (Helchin), ... ' This is quite remarkable.

Martine Vercruyce, from Dudzele (close to Bruges), and Charles Vercruyce may indeed be linked through this document; the document also mentions Petrus ('Pierre') Van der Gracht, from Helchin (right in between Deerlijk and Tournai).

Note that the Van der Gracht family acquired Hulste in 1618.[6]

48.4 Joannes De Vos, or Joan de Poch

As far as we discovered, Joannes de Vos was a Belgian of Flemish descent, but he went to Spain, either as a military or, more likely, for trade. He married there, had a daughter, and returned to Flanders when his wife died. He married a Desclergue in Flanders in a second marriage, while his Spanish daughter later married a blood relative of the Desclergues. He was known as Joan de Poch in Spain because this family name is widespread in Barcelona, where Joan resided.

Based on the records we discovered, the parents of Joannes de Vos were well-connected with the Spanish in Flanders, including de Montoya. So, very likely, they were acquainted with the Desclergues first in Flanders and later in Spain, not vice versa.

Joannes de Vos had the following siblings: Joanna (1636), Margareta (1638), Judoca (1641), Martina (1643) and Elisabeta (1646). His parents were Laurens de Vos and Isabelle Verscheure. His father Laurens, also known as Petrus Laurentius de Vos, was a son of Pieter de Vos (who died in Harelbeke on April 4, 1621) and Michelina Van Meulebroucke (who died in Harelbeke on June 26, 1621). Pieter De Vos was a son of Jan De Vos and Genie Streyers. Jan de Vos died before 1559 and was a son of Eloy De Vos.

Isabelle Verscheure was the daughter of Jacobus Verscheure, and she would die at Harelbeke in 1683. Isabella Verscheure was baptized as Elisabet Anna Graner, daughter of Jaume Graner (i.e. Jacobus Verscheure) and Maria Anna, on October 16, 1605, in San Martin, Pau, Girona, Spain.[7]

We refer the reader first to Chapter 28.5 to understand Joannes De Vos.

Joannes de Vos was born in 1633 at Harelbeke, in Figure 48.23. His Godfather was Juan de Montosa (on the document spelled 'Joannes Demontauze,' who was, purely based on his death certificate, a descendent of the noble house of Braña), a Spanish military who would die at Sint Eloois Vijve in 1678. The Godmother was Catarina Gol/Galés/Gals.

It's interesting to find out who Catherine Gol/Galés/Gals was.

She married Lucas Huysentruyt, son of Jan Lauwers Husentruyt and Jacoba Parmentier. Lucas was a brewer, the Lord of Mosscher at Kuurne, and the Lord of Nieuwenhuyse. He received bourgeoisie rights (buitenpoorter, or, bourgeois forain) of Kortrijk at Harelbeke from 1593 until 1623 and his wife Catherine Gol/Galés/Gals from 1631 until 1645.

In 1624, she married Petrus Vercoutre again at Zwevegem; the witnesses were Domino Catharina Waltrich ('Waultrik'), probably with German roots, and Judocus de Roo.

She must have been a critical figure because she forms a link with Laurentius De Vos and the family Rollefoort, which appears on many of our certificates. On August 26, 1624, at Harelbeke, she was godmother to a son, Arnoldus Vanhoutte, of her sister-in-law; the child's father being Jacobus Vanhoutte, the mother being Judoca Vercouttere and godfather being Arnoldus Vanhoutte.

In 1633, on October 19, at Harelbeke, she was godmother to Laurentius Husentruyt, son of Laurentius Huysentruyt and Anna Demunck; the godfather was Laurentius De Vos.

On October 20, 1634, at Harelbeke, she was Godmother, with godfather Adrianus Rollefoort, to Catharina Rollefoort, daughter of Jacobus Rollefoort and Catharina Mareels.

Apart from the mentioned events, we found her as godmother in Harelbeke several times, probably due to her social status and connections.

In Chapter 34.6.3, we describe Jacobus Rollefoort as a witness, with Petrus Clere, at the wedding of Gaspar Portocarrrero with Joanna de Carron in 1643 in Harelbeke. This Petrus Clere, or Pieter Declercq, was the brother-in-law of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and is described in Chapter 35.

It's also interesting to read in Chapter 37.4.2 that we found another connection with the Rollefoort family.

Indeed, in 1621, at Houtave, Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz married Maria de Sapena. There were three witnesses, namely Petrus Daens, Pedro de Sapena, and Bethina de Roo, the wife of Lenaert Rollefoort. Even the name 'de Roo' appears again.

Rollefoort is also a family name in Wingene, where Michael Rollefoort married Anna Declercq in 1629 (perhaps linked to Antoni Desclergue (I)). She would later live in Harelbeke as the wife of Joan Bucquet, as can be found elsewhere.

The birth certificate of Joannes De Vos indicates that the family had bonded with the Spanish. Therefore, it is not surprising that Joannes De Vos married a daughter of the Desclergues, Joana Declercgz (DC08b).

The godfather was Antonius Josephus Follé. Most likely, the Courssel family was from Bruges.*

Juan de Montoya is described in Chapter 29.10.8.1[8][9]. He was blood-related to Felipa de Montoya, wife of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05).

Petrus Laurentius De Vos and Isabella Verscheure married at Harelbeke in 1632. Witnesses were Petrus De Vos and Petrus Van der Gracht. The Van der Gracht family was a noble family with ties to the Azores.

48.4.1 The First Marriage of Joannes De Vos in Spain, to Maria Anna (de Portea y) Roure

Joannes de Vos lived for a while in Barcelona and Blanes, Spain. Indeed, traces are found of Joan de Vos in Spain before his second marriage in Harelbeke, Belgium, in 1685. Indeed, he is referred to in a manuscript of 1679 as the father at his daughter's wedding. Geneanet® provides a transcript of the following wedding of a daughter Maria Anna de Vos, daughter of Joannes De Vos and Maria Anna Portea i Roure:

'Blanes, Gerona (Lugar del matrimonio), 14-08-1679 (Fecha de matrimonio), Maria Anna (Nombres), Poch y Roure (Apellido); Antoni (Nombre de pila del cónyuge), de Padrola y Desclergue (Apellido del cónyuge); Antoni (Nombre de pila del cónyuge); Joan (Nombres del padre), de Poch (Apellido del padre); Maria Anna (Nombres de la madre); Francisco (Nombres del padre del cónyuge), de Padrola y Desclergue (Apellido del padre del cónyuge); Maria Anna (Nombre de pila de la madre del cónyuge).'

It means that,

'at Blanes, Gerona (Place of marriage) on 08-14-1679 (Date of marriage), there was the wedding of Maria Anna Poch y Roure (Names & Surname), daughter of Joan de Vos (de Poch) (Father's names & Father's last name) and Maria Anna Roure (Mother's names & her Surname extracted from the Surname of the bride). The groom was Antoni de Pedrolo y Desclergue (Spouse's First Name & Spouse's Last Name), son of Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergue (Names of the spouse's father & Surname of the spouse's father) and Maria Anna (First name of the spouse's mother).'

This matches information obtained from Montblanc. Indeed, the parents of Antoni were Francesc Jacinto de Pedrolo y Desclergue (DC05ex1y2) (born at Montblanc in 1641 and dead in Montblanc in 1685) and Anna Maria de Ratera i Robuster.

We also know from other sources that Antoni de Pedrolo y Desclergue was born at Montblanc in 1659 and would marry (in a second marriage) Jerònia de Folcràs in 1693. The latter was born at Cervera (Spain) in 1658 and died at Montblanc in 1708.

Joan de Vos also appears in 1685 in,

'Causa de Joan de Poch, ciudadano honrado de Barcelona en la villa de Blanes habitante, tutor y curador de los pupilos, hijos y herederos de Gaspar Sala, mercader de la villa de Lloret, obispado de Girona'[10].

One can find further information about Antoni in Chapter 28.5, devoted to his father, Francesc Jacinto de Pedrolo y Desclergue (DC05ex1y2). The latter was married to Anna Maria de Ratera y Robuster.

The concerned daughter of Joan de Vos and Maria Anna (de Portea i) Roure was baptized on March 17, 1661, at Santa Maria, Blanes, Gerona, Spain. Her complete name was Maria Anna Scholastica Ignacia Poch y Roure. Her father was registered as Joan de Poch, and her mother, Maria Anna.

It means that she married at 18 and was born when Joan was 28. We found this information in the registered transcript on [8] Note that the possibility of Juan de Montosa de Braña being Jean de Montauzée of Branne (also known as Brana, near Bordeaux in France) has been considered during this research. Although we cannot exclude that this was indeed a French military who drowned in the Leie at Sint Eloois Vijve in May 1678, which is just before the Treaty of Nijmegen, on August 10, 1678, we have severe doubts given the fact that we only found this person one other time, namely on the birth certificate of Joannes De Vos in 1633. It does not seem plausible that a French military would have been at Harelbeke in 1633. Indeed, the area had become temporarily French in 1668 until the Treaty of Nijmegen, by the Devolution war. But 1633 was much earlier. Another option is that two persons are concerned here: a Spanish Juan de Montosa in 1633 in Harelbeke and a French Jean de Monauzée of Branne in Sint Eloois Vijve in 1678. We cannot be 100% sure. However, we must also highlight that the expression 'miles regi(u)s' (Royal Soldier or King's Soldier) has been found in Spain's literature, not France's. Based on this fact, the odds are high that the person who drowned in Sint Eloois Vijve was indeed a Spanish Juan de Montosa de Braña.

Geneanet®. De Vos and de Pedrolo y Desclergue may have been acquainted through de Vos and Desclergue in Belgium, or else de Vos found the Desclergues in Belgium because of his connection with de Pedrolo y Desclergue.[11]

48.4.2 The Second Marriage of Joannes De Vos in Harelbeke (Flanders - Belgium), to Joana Declercgz (DC08b)

When Joannes de Vos, born in Belgium in 1633 and living in Barcelona or Blanes, lost his wife, Maria Anna (de Portea i) Roure, and remarried Joana Declercgz (DC08b), he was already 52 years old. His bride was 28 years old and had already married a Spanish soldier.

It indicates that Joannes de Vos must have been wealthy.

Joannes De Vos and Joana Declercgz (DC08b) married at Harelbeke in 1685, in Figures 48.24 and 48.24. Joana Declercgz (DC08b) was blood-related to Joannes De Vos's son-in-law Antoni de Pedrolo y Desclergue.

This relationship was as follows: Antoni's great-grandfather was Francesc Desclergue (DC05e), brother of Enric Desclergue (DC05), who was the great-grandfather of Joana Declercgz (DC08b).

Again, this is evidence that until the 1680s, the Desclergue in Belgium was in touch with the Desclergue in Spain.

48.4.3 The Children of Joannes De Vos and Catharina Declercgz (DC08b)

Martina De Vos (DC08bx1) was born in 1686, in Figure 48.26 at Harelbeke, Belgium, daughter of Joannes De Vos and Joana Declercgz (DC08b).

Martina De Vos (DC08bx1) would, in 1703, at Harelbeke, serve as godmother to Maria Catharina Vandeputte (DC08dx1) (Du Puich), daughter of Egidius Vandeputte (Du Puich), and Maria Declercgz (DC08d), daughter of Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07); The godfather was Joan Declercgz (DC08c). We refer to Chapter 37.9.2.1.

48.4.3.2 Maria Magdalena De Vos (DC08bx2)

Maria Magdalena De Vos (DC08bx2) was born, in Figure 48.27, in 1688 at Harelbeke, Belgium, and was the daughter of Joannes De Vos and Joana Declercgz (DC08b).

48.4.3.3 Joannes Baptiste De Vos (DC08by1)

Joannes Baptiste De Vos (DC08by1) was born in 1689, in Figure 48.28, at Harelbeke, Belgium, son of Joannes De Vos and Joana Declercgz (DC08b). His godmother was Martine De Vos.

Martine De Vos was a daughter of Carolus De Vos, born in 1665 in Deerlijk, in Figure 48.29, and sister of Judoca de Vos, born in Deerlijk, in Figure 48.30 in 1675. Her godfather was Oliverius Nolf, and her godmother was Martina Christaens.

Carolus De Vos was born in Harelbeke in 1634, the son of Petrus Laurentius de Vos ('Laurentius De Vos') and Isabella Verscheure. His godfather was Carolus Demaryvoorde, and his godmother was Maria Conincx. Therefore, Carolus De Vos was the brother of Joannes De Vos.

Carolus De Vos married Judoca Demeestere in Deerlijk in 1664. Witnesses were Jacobus Van Outrijve and Christina De Graeve.

We found a Jacobus Van Outrijve married to a Margareta De Vos at Harelbeke in 1662, 'akte 851,' and witnesses were Simone Staes and custode, which is an indication of a lack of family members at Harelbeke at that time.

We also found Arnoldus De Vos, baptized in Deerlijk in 1700, in Figure 48.31, son of Judocus de Vos and Judoca de Meestere, with Godfather Guilemus De Vos and godmother Martina Demeester.

We, therefore, suspect that Joannes De Vos (born at Harelbeke in 1633) had the following siblings and half-siblings: Margarita De Vos (at Deerlijk in 1675), Stephanus De Vos (at Deerlijk in 1675), Guilelmus De Vos (at Deerlijk in 1670) and Carolus De Vos (born in Harelbeke in 1634, present at Deerlijk in 1664, 1665, 1675, 1700).

We found Esteve Poch (Stephanus de Vos) in Spain in documents in 1638, 1643, 1650, 1656, which is before he became a godfather in 1675 in Figure 48.30.

48.4.3.4 Maria Anna De Vos (DC08bx3)

Maria Anna De Vos (DC08bx3) was born in 1693 at Harelbeke, in Figure 48.32, in Belgium, and was the daughter of Joannes De Vos and Joana Declercgz (DC08b).
She was named after the daughter Maria Anna De Vos of the first wife of Joannes De Vos, who died before 1693, which we know because her husband remarried in 1693.
In Figure 48.33, we found her as Godmother.

48.4.3.5 Petrus De Vos (DC08by2)

Petrus De Vos (DC08by2) was born in 1697 at Harelbeke, Belgium. He was the son of Joannes De Vos and Joana Catharina Declercgz (DC08b) and is described below in Chapter 48.5.

48.5 Petrus De Vos (DC08by2)

48.5.1 His Birth, Life and Death

He was born in 1697, in Figure 48.35, at Harelbeke, Belgium; He died in 1774, in Figure 48.36, in Hulste, Belgium, and was a son of Joannes De Vos and Joana Declercgz (DC08b).
Petrus De Vos (DC08by2) was orphaned at a young age. We do not know what happened to him, except that he married Elizabeth De Mets in Hulste in 1729 and remarried Hendrica Theresia Depoorter in 1742.
We stem from his second wife.
Hulste is adjacent to Harelbeke and is also the village where his niece Maria Catharina Declercq (DC08cx3), daughter of his uncle Joan Declercgz (DC08c) and Joanna Debels, would marry in a second marriage to Petrus Verhelst in 1734. Petrus Verhelst had a sister, Christina Verhelst, who had married, in 1730 at Hulste, Joannes (Baptiste) De Vos (DC08by1); the wedding witnesses had been Martina De Vrieze and Joannes Maes.
Petrus De Vos (DC08by2) likely grew up with Maes, who were acquaintances of Joana Declercgz (DC08b) and Petrus De Vos.
Note that earlier in this book, we suggested that the first appearing 'Maes' in this ancestry story, namely Maria Maes, who married Laurentius De Vos, might have been Maria de Maza. The latter is a family name that existed in the Gerona region around 1600.
Therefore, this family might have Spanish roots as well.
For instance, Joana Declercgz (DC08b) appears as a godmother on a birth certificate at Harelbeke in 1690 of the son of Catharina Maes.
Catharina Maes, who appears in Figure 48.37, was the daughter of Joannes Maes and was born at Deerlijk in 1663, in Figure 48.38.
Catharina Maes was a witness in 1729 at the wedding at Hulste of Petrus De Vos (DC08by2) and Elizabeth De Mets.
We extracted the names of the witnesses and godparents, who are connections of importance to our ancestry, from the marriages and baptisms shown in further records.
The Maes family: Joannes and Maria Catharina;
The de Vos family: Petrus Joseph;
The Vandeputte / Du Puich family: Maria Josephine;
The Callens family: Maria;
A link with Deerlijk: Petrus Franciscus Josephus Lieluy (the vice pastor of Deerlijk).
The other witnesses and godparents were:
The De Graeve family: Petrus, Christina, Rogeria and Guillelmus;
The Van Rumbeke family: Catharina, Livinus, Petrus, Elisabetha Cule (the wife of Petrus Van Rumbeke), and Anna;
The de Mets family: Franciscus, Guillelmus, Joannes and Thomas;
The De Poortere family: Antonius Franciscus, Judocus, Maria Catharina, and Maria Magdalena.
Other families: Judoca Devolder, Elisabetha Vandersteene, Ignatius Fernod, Jacobus De Meyere, Anthonius Feys, Maria Anna Rosa Bauvin, Joannes Verhelst, Judoca Michiels, Joannes de Vroe, and Anna de Langhe.

48.5.2 Elizabeth De Mets, the First Wife of Petrus De Vos (DC08by2), and their Children

Elizabeth De Mets was born in 1708 in Hulste, Belgium. She is not our ancestor. However, her children's church certificates are essential to exposing family bonds.

48.5.2.1 Elizabeth De Mets' Birth and Death

Elizabeth De Mets was born in Hulste in 1708, in Figure 48.39, she died there in 1741, in 48.40.
Her mother was Anna Van Rumbeke.
In Chapter 29.8.3.5, the reader will find that in 1701, Maria Declercgz (DC08d), granddaughter of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), married Egidius Vandeputte (Gilles Du Puich), son of Mathias Vandeputte (Mathieu De Puich) and Joanna Van Rumbeke.
Elizabeth De Mets was, therefore, related to Egidius Vandeputte, which is likely how the Hulste branch of our ancestors was initiated.

48.5.2.2 Their Marriage and Children

They married in Hulste in 1729, in Figure 48.41. The witnesses, Van Rumbeke and Maes, formed a link with the Du Puich and Maes families, respectively. The baptisms of their children are shown in Figures 48.42, 48.43, 48.44, 48.45, 48.46, 48.47 and 48.48.

48.5.3 Hendrica Theresia Depoorter, the Second Wife of Petrus De Vos (DC08by2), and their Children

Theresia Depoorter and Petrus De Vos (DC08by2) are our ancestors.

48.5.3.1 Hendrica Theresia Depoorter's Birth and Death

Hendrica Theresia Depoorter was born in Hulste in 1719, in Figure 48.49. She died in Hulste in 1791, in 48.50.

48.5.3.2 Their Marriage and Children

They married in Hulste, 1742, in Figure 48.51. The baptisms of their children are shown in Figures 48.52, 48.53, 48.54, 48.55, 48.56, 48.57 and our ancestor in 48.59.

48.6 Petrus Franciscus Josephus De Vos (DC08by2y1)

The descendants of Petrus Franciscus Josephus De Vos (DC08by2y1) are shown in Figure 48.58. He was born in 1745, in Figure 48.59 in Hulste, Belgium. He married Maria Catharina Josepha De Vos, born at Oostrozebeke, in Hulste, in 1773, in Figure 48.60. The baptism of Maria Catharina Josepha De Vos is found in Figure 48.61, and her parents' wedding is in Figure 48.62.
After the death of Maria Catharina Josepha de Vos in 1786, Petrus Franciscus Josephus de Vos remarried widow Maria Josepha Devolder, in Figures 48.63 and 48.64, in Hulste on July 4, 1787. Maria Josepha Devolder was the widow of Guillelmus Sobri.

48.7 Petrus Franciscus De Vos (DC08by2y1y1) & Marie Agnes Vanhaezebrouck

48.7.1 Petrus Franciscus De Vos

The descendants of Petrus Franciscus De Vos (DC08by2y1y1) and Marie Agnes Vanhaezebrouck are shown in Figure 48.65.
Petrus Franciscus De Vos (DC08by2y1y1) was born at Hulste in 1775, in Figure 48.66, and he died at Wielsbeke in 1844 in Figure 48.67.
Note that Petrus De Vos (DC08by2) died in 1774. His grandchild Petrus Franciscus De Vos (DC08by2y1y1), born in 1775, was named after him. Because he had passed away and could not be godfather, his second wife, Theresia Depoorter, served as godmother.

Figure 48.71: Hulste, May 9, 1804 (19 florial, an XII), the marriage of Petrus Franciscus De Vos and Marie Agnes Vanhaezebrouck. The groom was 29 years old and was born in Hulste on January 15, 1775, and was a son of Pierre François Joseph De Vos and Marie Catherine De Vos, who had died in Hulste. The bride was 24 years old, born in Hulste on September 3, 1780, and was a daughter of Pierre Joseph Vanhaesebrouck and Marie Anne De Voldere, who had died in Hulste. The witnesses were 59-year-old Pierre François Joseph De Vos, father of the groom, and 64-year-old Pierre Joseph Vanhaesebrouck, father of the bride. There was also 44-year-old Jean François De Vos, uncle of the groom, and 37-year-old Antoine Vanoutryve.

Note that Petrus Franciscus De Vos (DC08by2y1y1), on his wedding certificate in Figure 48.71, uses a modern signature instead of just his name, i.e., he signed as 'P. F. De Vos.'

48.7.2 Marie Agnes Vanhaezebrouck

She was born in Hulste in 1780, in Figure 48.68, and she died in Wielsbeke in 1837 in Figures 48.69 and 48.70. Her parents, Petrus Joseph Vanhaesebrouck and Marie Anne De Voldere, died in Hulste, respectively, in 1817 and 1793.

48.7.3 Their Marriage

Their marriage was in 1804, in Hulste, Belgium, in Figure 48.71.

48.8 Louis De Vos (DC08by2y1y1y1) & Eugenie Libbrecht

48.8.1 Louis De Vos

Louis De Vos was born in Wielsbeke in 1812, in Figures 48.73 and 48.74.
His descendants are shown in Figure 48.72.
He died in Wielsbeke in 1897, Figure 48.75.
His military record is exposed in Figure 48.76.

48.8.2 Eugenie Libbrecht

She was born at Ooigem in 1819, in Figure 48.77, and she died in Wielsbeke on February 21, 1881, in Figure 48.78.
The obituary card of her auntie is shown in Figure 48.79.

They married at Wielsbeke in 1841, in Figure 48.80.

48.8.4 Their Offspring

The births of their children are shown in Figures 48.81, 48.83, 48.84, 48.85,48.86.
The military record of Pieter Francis De Vos, born in 1842, is shown in Figure 48.82.
Marie Louise De Vos (DC08by2y1y1y1x1), our ancestor, born in 1859, is described further in Chapter 48.9.

48.9 Marie Louise De Vos (DC08by2y1y1y1x1) & Theophile Verhaeghe

48.9.1 Marie Louise De Vos

The most recent descendants of Marie Louise De Vos are shown in Figure 48.87.
She was born in 1859, on January 27, in Wielsbeke, in Figure 48.88, as the daughter of Louis De Vos (Wielsbeke, 1812) and Eugenie Libbrecht (Ooigem, 1810).
Louis De Vos has roots in the area of Hulste-Wielsbeke.
Eugenie Libbrecht is the daughter of Jean Cornele Libbrecht (Bavikhove, 1785) with roots in Bavikhove, Zwevegem, and Deerlijk and of Marie Jeanne de Poortere with roots in Beveren-Leie and having ancestors Servaege and Heineken around 1600. She died in 1919, a little more than a half year after the death of her son, soldier Maurice Verhaeghe, described in Chapter 48.9.5.4.

48.9.2.1 Introduction and some Basic Facts

He was born in 1863, on December 31, in Sint Eloois Vijve, in Figure 48.91, as the son of Edouard Verhaeghe and Ursula Baert.
He died in Deerlijk on July 21, 1926, in Figures 48.92 48.93.
His military service file is given in Figure 48.94.
He married Marie Louise De Vos in 1884 in Wielsbeke on October 17, at 4 pm. Theophile was 21 when he married, while Marie-Louise was already 25. Both had already lost one parent at the time of their wedding.
He passed away in Deerlijk on July 21, 1926, Belgium's national day. He was a construction Entrepreneur, Architect of the Profession, and master brick-mason. He was also an innkeeper at Harelbeke for some time. He has been directly involved in constructing the arch at the Cinquantenaire parc at Brussels and the Basilica of Dadizele.

Figure 48.80: Wielsbeke, the marriage of Louis De Vos and Eugenie Libbrecht, June 8, 1841. The groom lived in Wielsbeke and was born there on December 17, 1812; he was a son of 66-year-old Petrus de Vos, who lived in Wielsbeke and was present at the wedding, and Agnes Van Haezebrouck, who died on June 13, 1832, in Wielsbeke. The groom had done his military service. The bride lived in Wielsbeke and was born in Ooigem on January 20, 1819; she was the daughter of 55-year-old Joannes Cornelis Libbrecht, present at the wedding and Marie Jeanne Depoortere, who died in Ooigem on July 13, 1840.

Theophile's father, Edouard Verhaeghe, was born in Waregem in 1821 and died in Kortrijk in 1907. He was married to Ursula Baert. His roots can be found in Waregem; he was the son of Antoon Verhaeghe and Maria Josepha Corneille.

Ursula Baert was born in 1829 and died in 1867 in Harelbeke as the daughter of Dominicus Baert (son of Franciscus Baert and Judoca Beyens) and Francesca Xaveria Pauwels (daughter of Joannes Baptiste Pauwels and Anne-Marie Snauwaert). She has roots in Zulte, Waregem and Wortegem.

Freddy Byttebier[18] from Heemkring Dorp en Toren explained that the cemetery of Deerlijk, originally located around the main church, has been moved to its current location in 1930. The first new grave at the present cemetery was that of Albert Casteele on June 25, 1925. It is sure that Marie Louise De Vos was buried at the old cemetery, while Theophile Verhaeghe was buried at the new cemetery. Possibly, Marie Louise was moved to a new place to rest with her husband. We don't have any further information. The grave is not there anymore. Very likely, it has been removed after 50 years.

48.9.2.2 The life of Theophile Verhaeghe

Theophile Verhaeghe, illustrated in Figure 48.93, was a prominent construction contractor active in the early 20th century.

Initially residing in Harelbeke and later moving to Deerlijk, he specialized in building private residences. His expertise extended beyond residential projects, contributing to notable architectural works, including the triumphal arch at the Cinquantenaire in Brussels in 1905 (Figure 48.95) and the reconstruction of the Basilica of Dadizele between 1921 and 1924 (Figure 48.96).

Despite a tremor that impeded his writing abilities, the cause remains unknown. Verhaeghe excelled in sketching and calculating construction plans with remarkable precision. His tremor, while affecting his handwriting, did not hinder his capability to draft intricate designs and execute detailed calculations. His proficiency allowed him to present clients with accurate cost estimates, material requirements, and project timelines, demonstrating expertise that blended craftsmanship with entrepreneurial acumen.

Verhaeghe often claimed illiteracy to avoid the discomfort of writing in public despite being literate. This subterfuge was likely a strategy to mitigate situations where his tremor might be misinterpreted as a lack of competence. Notably, he refrained from signing birth certificates for his children, likely to avoid public scrutiny of his shaky handwriting.

Administrative records also reveal that he operated an inn, indicating his versatility and business savvy.

Theophile Verhaeghe's legacy extended to his children, who inherited his entrepreneurial spirit. His daughter, Zozyma Verhaeghe, exemplified this by becoming a haute couture dressmaker. Specializing in ceremonial attire, she sometimes crafted dresses without preliminary sketches, relying on her innate design skills—a testament to the innovative mindset fostered by her father.

Documented evidence of Verhaeghe's handwriting appears sparingly. His marriage certificate from 1884 displays a steady hand, suggesting confidence and control. In contrast, his 1920 application to the Combatant Fund shows a pronounced tremor, reflecting his physical condition at the time. However, a construction plan from the late 1920s shows minimal shaking, indicating moments of clarity or mastery over his ailment during professional tasks.

Theophile Verhaeghe's contributions to the construction and entrepreneurial legacy resonate within his family and the broader community. They illustrate a blend of technical skills, business acumen, and adaptive strategies that inspire modern construction engineers, architects, and entrepreneurs.

48.9.2.3 The Verhaeghe Family: A Legacy of Adventurous Spirit and Resilience

The Verhaeghe family, descendants of Theophile Verhaeghe, epitomize a unique blend of industriousness and entrepreneurial spirit. Unlike other branches of our ancestral tree, the Verhaeghe lineage stands out for its distinct characteristics, which are no less compelling. Historical accounts and testimonies reveal that many of Theophile's descendants possessed a robust and adventurous spirit, reminiscent of the daring personas celebrated in Johnny Cash's song 'Highwaymen.'

These descendants were known for their daring lifestyles, often characterized by a penchant for adventure and recklessness. Some were womanizers and had extramarital children, demonstrating a defiance of conventional norms. This boldness was accompanied by notable physical strength, further underscoring their larger-than-life presence.

However, it is crucial to acknowledge that not every descendant exhibited these traits. As with any attribute, the key to its value lies in its wise application. When channeled effectively, the Verhaeghe family's adventurous spirit became a source of strength and resilience.

This indomitable spirit was most vividly displayed during times of conflict. Members of the Verhaeghe family earned medals for their bravery during World War I and played active roles in the resistance movements of both World War I and World War II. Their contributions to these significant historical events underscore a legacy of courage and patriotism.

The Verhaeghe family's story is of resilience, strength, and a relentless pursuit of adventure. Their unique characteristics and daring exploits add a vibrant chapter to our family history, celebrating a lineage that embraced life's challenges with vigor and determination.

48.9.2.3.1 Bernard Verhaeghe Bernard Verhaeghe (V01b) is the granduncle of Theophile Verhaeghe, as shown in Figure 48.97, and was Napoleon's military from April 25, 1813, to his death on June 13, 1813. An image of Napoleon is shown in Figure 48.98.

Between April 25, 1813, and his death on June 13, he participated, like all recruits of that period, in la Bataille de Lützen, as the French call the battle, or der Schlacht bei Großgörschen, as the Germans prefer. The battle occurred between Napoleon's debacle in Russia and his eventual loss and exile to Elba. After his stay in Elba, Napoleon rose from his ashes in 100 days and gave his opponents full charge in Belgium. We know, of course, that this ended severely for Napoleon in the battle near Waterloo, South of Brussels. Historians often cite the Lützen battle as an example of Napoleon's strategic ingenuity and military insight. At that time, Napoleon was at the height of his ability as a military leader.

De tijd van het leven is om den bermhertigen God te zoeken; de tijd van de dood is om Hem te vinden, en de tijd van de eeuwigheid is om Hem te genieten.

Het bed van den zieke is een altaar waarop aangename opofferingen aan God kunnen gedaan worden. Gelukkig de rechtveerdige, die in den last der ziekelijkheid gewillig de ongemakken aanveerdt, waarmede God hem beproeft en eveneens zuivert. Zijne ziel draagt den stempel der gelukzaligheid.

Wat is er zoeter dan de deugdzaamheid, aantrekkelijker dan de bedaardheid, beter dan de eerlijkheid?

Mijne dierbare Kinderen en Kleinkinderen, op dit droevig oogenblik van afscheid, kunt gij u niet beter troosten, dan met het gedacht aan de zalige sterkte waarmede ik mij bereid heb tot den gewichtigen overgang naar de eeuwigheid, door het christelijk ontvangen der laatste Sacramenten. Blijft met liefde en vrede vereenigd in God! Bidt voor mij.

Jesus, almachtige en oneindige goede Meester, geef aan de ziel van uwen onderdanigen dienaar Theofiel de eeuwige rust.

Although the archives provide little information, we can assume that Bernard Verhaeghe was wounded in Lützen and transferred to the French military hospital of Maastricht, where he contracted typhus and died of it.

He was born at Waregem in 1794 (found in 'akte 1435'), and his Matricule number was 10152. He was a soldier in the 22e régiment d' infanterie de ligne which recruited from March 27, 1812 until April 15, 1813 (matricules 8401 à 10200). His military record literally tells:

'Verhaeghe Bernard, fils de Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe et Marie Jeanne Rigolle, né le 11 septembre 1794 à Waregem, canton de Harelbeke, departement de la Lys, taille d' un mètre 63 centimètres, visage ovale, front couvert, yeux bruns, nez gros, bouche moyenne, menton rond, cheveux j(aune), sourcils brun, marques particuliers nihil. Arrivé au Corps le 15 avril 1813, conscrit de l' an 1814, compris sur la liste de désignation du canton de Harelbeke, sous le Numéro 35. Son dernier domicile était a Waregem, departement de la Lys. Profession de tisserand. Mort 'a l' hôpital de Maastricht' (Perhaps the hospital looked like Figure 48.100) ', le 13 Juin 1813 parsuite d' une fièvre adynamique[19].'

Very likely, according to Klaas Portier,[20] he died of Typhus.

The Battle of Lützen took place on May 2, 1813, and was a victory of Napoleon's French forces against allied Russo-Prussian forces. It was the first battle of the Befreiungskriege in Germany during the War of the Sixth Coalition, under the command of General Gebhard Leberecht von Blücher and Marshal Ludwig Adolf Peter Zu Sayn-Wittgenstein, which Napoleon's enemies had formed after his defeat in Russia and the difficulties in Iberia.

Napoleon's army forced the Allies to retreat but could not chase down the defeated troops due to a lack of cavalry. The victory, therefore, could not bear fruits to its full extent. In the Spring of 1813, Napoleon's 145000 men strong army went to Leipzig through the Thuringian Forest. On May 1, his vanguard came into battle with Ferdinand von Wintzingerode, a Russian commander of the Austrian army, after which they occupied Lützen and Flossgraben. The latter was, in fact, a route for the transport of logs cut in the higher forests.

The night of May 1, Napoleon spent at the monument to the First Battle of Lützen, which took place in 1632 and in which King Gustav II Adolf of Sweden was killed. So, the battle of 1813 was, in fact, the second Battle of Lützen. He moved on to Leipzig the next day but left Marechal Ney in Großgörschen to cover his right flank. Ney, shown in Figure 48.101, had occupied the villages of Grossgörschen, Rahna, Caja, and Kleingörschen. The Prussian-Russian army was across the White Elster, the river that flows to Leipzig.

The following day, Ney was attacked by Prussian and Russian soldiers under General Gerhard von Scharnhorst at noon.

Napoleon came back to his aid, which led to a heavy battle that left 22000 dead and wounded on the French side and 8500 Prussians and 3000 Russians dead and injured.

Nevertheless, Napoleon was the victor, and France again possessed Saxony and the Elbe line.

Figure 48.105: The death of 56-year-old Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe, Waregem, July 26, 1806. The document erroneously tells he was 55 years old, probably they mixed him up with another Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe, born on March 3, 1751 and a son of Petrus Verhaeghe and Joanna Theresia Verbrugghe. He was the husband of Marie Anne Rigolle, a cloth manufacturer. The death was reported by his wife and by Pierre François Achtergaele. Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe was born in Zwevegem, he resided in Nieuwenhove in Waregem, and he was a son of Joseph Verhaeghe and Marie Anne Laetevoet ('Laetegoet').

48.9.2.3.2.1 Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe

Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe was born in Zwevegem on January 23, 1750, in Figure 48.102. His parents were Pierre Joseph Verhaeghe and Marie Anne Laetevoet.
He married Maria Joanna Angela Rigolle and died in Waregem, at the age of 56, on July 26, 1806, in Figure 48.105.
Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe was a brother of Maria Anna Theresia Verhaeghe, documented in Figures 48.103 and 48.104.

48.9.2.3.2.2 Maria Joanna Angela Rigolle

Maria Joanna Angela Rigolle was born in September 1765 in Waregem, in Figure 48.106. Her parents were Amandus Rigolle and Joanna Humbeck.
She died in Waregem on November 12, 1862, at 65, in Figure 48.107.
We have not further investigated the family Humbeck. On Geneanet® , some genealogists identify this family with Haembeck, Hombeck, or Haenbeck and claim they were initially from Kruishoutem. Their German-sounding name possibly means they were Catholics who moved from Westfalen in Germany during the Spanish period. Some of our German autosomal DNA links may originate from this family.

Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe and Maria Anna Angela Rigolle married at Waregem in 1788, in Figure 48.108.

48.9.2.3.3 Antonius Verhaeghe (V01) & Maria Josepha Corneille

Antonius was the brother of Bernard Verhaeghe (V01b).

48.9.2.3.3.1 Antonius Verhaeghe (V01)

From his wedding certificate, we can extract that Antoine Verhaeghe was born on October 3, 1790, at Waregem, and he was a textile weaver. He was a son of Jean Baptiste Verhaeghe, who had died at Waregem on July 26, 1806, and of Marie Anne Rigolle. Antonius Verhaeghe (V01) died on December 8, 1842, at 42, in Figure 48.109.

48.9.2.3.3.2 Maria Josepha Corneille

The list of baptisms at Waregem shows that she was born in 1793, with a baptism certificate of 1417.
Nevertheless, we have yet to find the baptisms at Waregem of that year and fear that the records have not survived.
She died in Waregem in 1866, in Figure 48.110.

48.9.2.3.3.3 Their Marriage

Marie Josephe Corneille was 27 when she married, in Figure 48.111. She was a spinster and a daughter of Pierre Antoine Corneille and Maria Jeanne Bettens (who died in Waregem in 1811).

Figure 48.112: Waregem, May 31, 1821, the birth of Edouard Verhaeghe. Note that he was born before his parents' marriage, as can be read in their wedding certificate the same year in Figure 48.111. He was the son of 30-year-old Antonius Verhaeghe, who honorably recognized the child as his son on the birth certificate. This was agreed upon by the wise mother, 26-year-old Marie Josephe Corneille. It is important to note that this could only be done if the mothers consented, which indicates that Marie Josephe Corneille must have been a respectable lady. Edouard was born in Potegem, a suburb of Waregem.

geboren te Harelbeke, op 30 september 1888 en godvruchtig overleden te Wetteren, op 25 november 1969, voorzien van het H. Sakrament der Zieken en gesterkt door de Pauselijke Zegen.

In vroom vertrouwen op Gods Vaderlijke barmhartigheid komen wij, in gemeenschappelijk gebed, de ziel van deze overledene aanbevelen aan de goedheid van Hem die onze Schepper en onze Verlosser is.

" Betoon dan, Heer, Uw barmhartigheid aan Uw overleden dienares. Moge zij, door Uw oneindige goedheid, opgenomen worden in het eeuwig geluk."

Dierbare kinderen en familie, ik dank U voor al uw liefde en voor al de goede zorgen die ik van U mocht ondervinden. Bidt gij nu voor mij ; dat ten minste kan ons nog steeds verder verenigd houden.

Tot weerziens bij de Heer.

Heer en Mevrouw Charles Baeyens - Van Houtven, kinderen en kleinkind, De Families Verhaeghe en Van Houtven, danken U van harte voor de blijken van deelneming en gebeden.

The wedding took place after the birth of Edouard Verhaeghe, born on May 11, 1821; therefore, the child had to be legalized on their marriage certificate.

48.9.2.3.4 Edouard Verhaeghe (V02) & Ursula Baert

48.9.2.3.4.1 Edouard Verhaeghe (V02) Edouard Verhaeghe was born in Waregem on May 31, 1821, in Figure 48.112, before his parents were married.
Nevertheless, he was registered correctly, and his parents soon married. A baptism record is like a holy contract of existence between a family and God. At the same time, birth registration is an existential, holy formalization of our society's existence. It must be done correctly and without later changes, additions, or corrections. Edouard's parents were wise enough to understand this.
His father was Antonius Verhaeghe, and his mother was Josephe Corneille. The family lived in Potegem, a suburb of Waregem located near the current Hippodrome.
Edouard Verhaeghe died in Kortrijk on October 6, 1907, in Figure 48.113. Perhaps he died at the hospital, located in the street Budastraat, where he passed away. We don't know. Still, his death was later registered in Harelbeke, where he resided.

48.9.2.3.4.2 Ursula Baert Ursula Baert was born at Sint Eloois Vijve on June 3, in 1829, in Figure 48.114 as the daughter of Dominicus Baert (son of Franciscus Baert and Judoca Beyens) and Francesca Xaveria Pauwels (daughter of Joannes Baptiste Pauwels and Anne-Marie Snauwaert). She has roots in Zulte and Waregem and Wortegem.
She died in Harelbeke, in Figure 48.115, at 38, on February 6, 1867.
DNA evidence is given in Chapter 73.8 on page 1590.

48.9.2.3.4.3 Their Marriage Edouard Verhaeghe married Ursula Baert on September 25, 1857, in Figures 48.116, 48.117 and 48.118, at Sint Eloois Vijve. From that certificate, for instance, we can extract the following information.
Edouard Verhaeghe was a servant (dienstbode) at the time of his wedding and lived at Waregem, where he was born on May 31, 1821, as the son of Antoine Verhaeghe (who died on December 8, 1834) and of Marie Josephe Corneille, a spinster, age 65 (born around 1793) and living at Waregem.
We can equally read that Ursula Baert was a spinster. On June 3, 1828, she was born at Sint Eloois Vijve, where she lived at the time of her wedding. She was the daughter of Dominicus Baert, a worker, age 69 (therefore born around 1788), and Francisca Pauwels, a spinner, age 61 (therefore born around 1796), both living at Sint Eloois Vijve.

48.9.3 The Marriage of Theophile Verhaeghe & Marie Louise De Vos

In Figure 48.119, their wedding was in 1884 in Wielsbeke, on October 17, at 4 pm.
At their marriage, Theophile Verhaeghe was a mason who lived in Harelbeke. His father was a farmer, and his mother had already died.
Marie Louise De Vos was a lace worker who resided in Wielsbeke.
Theophile was 21 when he married, while Marie Louise was already 25. Both had lost one parent at the time of their wedding.
At a later age, the couple can be seen in Figure 48.120.

48.9.4 Their Offspring, Entrepreneurship and the France and Brussels link.

Further in this book, we focus on Zozyma Zulma Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1x) in Chapter 48.11.
Here, we highlight the other children of Theophile Verhaeghe and Marie Louise De Vos.
Their children were all born at Harelbeke. In Deerlijk, we found Marie Louise Devos in the index in the population's register, referring to book 7, page 1220. This is a book covering the period 1900-1910. Although we have not seen the book with details yet, we can conclude that the family must have arrived from Harelbeke at Deerlijk no later than 1910.
Marie Louise de Vos and Theophile Verhaeghe had the following children:
Medardus Josephus Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xh), born at Harelbeke in 1885, akte 258; he married Elodie Marie Eeckhout.
Marie Leonie Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xb), born at Harelbeke in 1887 on March 28, akte 115; she married Gustaaf Vannieuwenhuyze.
Elisa Clara Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xc), born at Harelbeke in 1888 on September 30, akte 284; she married Guillaume Van Houtven.
Alida Augusta Marie Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xd), born at Harelbeke in 1890 on May 6, akte 183; she married Victor Alfons Simoens.
Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xi), born at Harelbeke in 1892 on February 15, akte 78; he died as a soldier.
Clotilde Maria Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xe), born at Harelbeke in 1894 on February 19, akte 69; she married Mr Plasse.
Renilde Marie Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xf), born at Harelbeke in 1896 on December 17, akte 465; she married René Delrue.
Verhaeghe Zozyma Zulma (DC08by2y1y1y1x1x), born at Harelbeke in 1898 on September 5, akte 318; she married Gerard Vangheluwe.
Seraphin René Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xj), born at Harelbeke in 1899 on October 30, akte 475; he married Rachelle Demeyere.
Irma Elisa Verhaeghe (DC08by2y1y1y1x1xg), born at Harelbeke in 1901 on September 16, akte 201; she married Theofiel Caby.
The surviving family, around 1926, is shown in Figure 48.121. We have no absolute certainty about their residence in Deerlijk. They probably even moved within the municipality once. Indeed, Maurice Verhaeghe's military records mention two addresses as a place of residence in Deerlijk: Vichtestraat 1 and Hoogstraat 23. On a work permit from his sister Zozyma Verhaeghe from 1917, we find Hoogstraat 23.

48.9.5 Offspring, Entrepreneurship and the Link to France and Brussels.

Theophile Verhaeghe probably established the initial links with Brussels.
Through his connections, his children could find employment in the capital.
Theophile had also established relationships with the North of France for similar reasons. Our archive has pictures of children visiting France for their holidays to study French.
The secure connection with Brussels and the North of France was why the Verhaeghes could speak and write French.

The associations also played an important role during both wars (WWI and WWII) in terms of their economic and underground activities. For instance, Zozyma Verhaeghe's home was a haven for individuals from Brussels who came by train to trade and connect with networks in and around Kortrijk.

Even after the war, the family sent children to French schools. The author unknowingly continued the tradition by sending his children, for around six years, to a French-speaking school in Dottignies across the language border in Belgium.

48.9.5.1 Seraphin René Verhaeghe & Rachelle Demeyere

Seraphin René Verhaeghe was known as René Verhaeghe and is shown in Figure 48.122. He was a good musician and played several instruments. He could even play the accordion very well.

His military record is given in Figure 48.123.

Seraphin René first married the love of his life. However, she passed away very unexpectedly shortly after their wedding while pregnant with their first child. At that time, the cause had never been determined.

He then married Rachelle Demeyere, shown in Figure 48.124.

We know, for instance, that Seraphin René Verhaeghe and Rachelle Demeyere had relatives across the border with France, shown in Figure 48.124. According to a picture with description, Rachelle's mother was Leonie, who lived with her son Joseph Demeyere and daughter-in-law Germaine at Vendin-le-Viel in 1938, neighboring Pont-a-Vendin and near Lens in France. In France, le Service Historique de la Défense lists Joseph Demeyere as a French resistance member during WWI.

We have yet to figure out who is who, how, and why they lived in France. In fact, we found several family names that are common to Flanders in that village, starting from around 1870. We probably found births at Vendin-le-Viel, perhaps of the three youngest children of the Demeyere family there: Leonie Georgette (1936), Pierre Jules (1935), and Paulette Jacqueline (1933).

48.9.5.2 Elisa Clara & Clothilde Verhaeghe

Here, we will focus a little bit on the daughters of Theophile Verhaeghe, of whom we know they have lived a while in Brussels.

The three stayed at Rolstraat 1 in Brussels. As it looks today, two pictures of the place are shown in Figure 48.126.

Elisa Clara Verhaeghe married Guillaume Van Houtven, and they moved to Wetteren. They had a daughter, Simone Van Houtven, who would marry Charles Bayens.

Clothilde Verhaeghe married Mr Plasse, shown in Figures 48.127, and they would have one daughter, Louise Plasse, shown in Figures 48.128 and 48.129, named after Marie-Louise De Vos. Her godmother was Zozyma Verhaeghe, though.

Clothilde Verhaeghe and her family lived in Brussels 1000 (Etterbeek), at Sint Michielslaan 125. Fortunately, the house is still there, depicted in Figure 48.130.

Marie Louise Plasse married Henri Mestdagh, and they settled at Mont Saint André in Ramillies, somewhere in Rue de l' Eglise. Interestingly, this is 5 km from where the Galle-Declercq family ended up, as described in Chapter 44.5.2. More charming memories are found in Figures 48.131, 48.132, 48.133 and 48.134.

48.9.5.3 Elodie Marie Eeckhout, a Courageous Woman, Wife of Medardus Verhaeghe

For many years, the person Elodie Marie Eeckhout, shown in Figures 48.135 and 48.137, has been a mystery during the investigations that resulted in this book. We also refer to Chapter 69.8.2.4. There were stories, and there were pictures, but we were unable to clarify and link matters. Curiosity sparks research, so we may state that the search for her has been a driving force in our investigations many years ago. She is not blood-related, but two of her children are. As described earlier in this chapter, these two children descend from Marie Louise De Vos and have Spanish roots.

In 1887, at Hulste, Elodie Marie's parents married. They were Barbara Theresia Depaepe, a lacemaker born in Hulste in 1865 as the daughter of Petrus Depaepe and Nathalie Carette, both workers and Petrus Martinus Eeckhout, a flax worker born at Ooigem in 1857 as the son of Angelus Eeckhout and Catherine Adens, also both workers.

Elodie Marie Eeckhout was their first child to survive after her sister Aloyise had died at Ooigem in 1889. She was born on August 9, 1889, in Desselgem. Two years later, in March of 1891, her brother Alphonse Joseph was born. In 1892, her sister Bertha Elisa was born, but she would die at 14 months.

Elodie Marie's father, Petrus, died in March of 1893 when she was not yet four years old. One month later, a brother, Julien Alphonse, was born at Desselgem, which must have been hugely symbolic as the father was not alive anymore to enjoy the birth of his son. The boy, unfortunately, would live only five months.

Elodie Marie's mother, who had two living children, re-married in November 1894 at Desselgem to Honoré Désiré Vanoverschelde, son of Joannes Vanoverschelde and Melanie Derycke and widower of Marie Louise Vandenbroucke and already a father of children older than Elodie Marie. A new half-sister of Elodie Marie was born in July 1895 at Desselgem. She was named Magdalena Zulma Vanoverschelde. She was six years younger than Elodie Marie. In 1897, a brother, Maurice Aloise Vanoverschelde, was born. In 1900, a brother, Robert Vanoverchelde, was born.

Being the eldest child and most probably longing for a better future, Elodie Marie first went to Kortrijk and then to Brussels around 16 to work. She did this with Elisa Clara Verhaeghe, the eldest daughter of Marie Louise De Vos, Theophile Verhaeghe, and her sister Clothilde Verhaeghe.

Likewise, they may have met in Kortrijk or Brussels and decided to stay together. We do not know.

Elodie Marie Eeckhout had a relationship in Brussels, and at the age of 21, this resulted in a daughter, Clara Eeckhout, born in Brussels on April 17, 1910. Most likely, Elisa Clara Verhaeghe was her godmother.

One year after Clara's birth, her mother married Medard Jozef Verhaeghe in Brussels on January 21, 1911, and he adopted Clara, so she became Clara Verhaeghe.

The family then moved to Marke near Kortrijk. It can, for instance, be found that he claimed funding after WWI.[21]

If time travel would ever be invented, it is essential to know that Elisa Clara Verhaeghe was called tante Clara and that Clara Verhaeghe (in case the time-traveler meets the Eeckhout family) was called Clara van Marke.

Their wedding had taken place on January 1, 1911, in Brussels.

[21] Folie 30, Boek 167, Akte 1919, Dossier Oorlogsschade, Medard Verhaeghe, Gemeente Marke.

Her address at that time was Rolstraat 1, Brussels, and the document indicates that she had lived in Kortrijk before this.

Medard Jozef Verhaeghe, born in Harelbeke as is found in Chapter 48.9.4, and son of Marie-Louise De Vos and Theophile Verhaeghe, lived in Vorst at that time after having lived in Anderlecht.

Elodie Marie's mother was still alive at the time of the wedding.[22]

Two witnesses involved with the Belgian Railways were Alfred Verhoeven (age 25, from Saint-Gilles) and Renaat Labeyt (age 25, from Vorst).

Clara Eeckhout, daughter of Elodie Marie, was adopted during the wedding and received a new name: Clara Verhaeghe, and she is shown in Figure 48.138.

Note that a document from 1928 reveals they must have moved back to Brussels. Indeed, Medard Jozef Verhaeghe and Elodie Marie Eeckhout must have lived for a while at Sint Jans Molenbeek at that time, in Landmeterstraat 8. Nowadays, there are modern 3-story apartments at that location. It is even likely that their eldest daughter remained in Marke as she was already an adult by then, and she was in close contact with the nearby family.

Rachelle Verhaeghe, shown in Figure 48.139, daughter of Marie Elodie Eeckhout and Medard Jozef Verhaeghe, married in London to Mr A. Strickland. The couple found each other thanks to contacts made by Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe during WWI. In Chapter 48.9.5.4, we can read that Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe was in England to be treated for a severe injury in 1915, after which he returned to the frontline in Belgium. Maurice was Rachelle's uncle. During his stay in England, he got to know the Strickland family and both families. After the war, they established contact with each other, which resulted in Rachelle marrying a member of the family. We do not know every detail but suggest the reader look at Chapter 48.10.

48.9.5.4 Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe

48.9.5.4.1 Introduction Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe was a resident of Deerlijk, fought on the Western Front for four years, and was killed in the final offensive in 1918.

Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe also appears in the journal 'Derlike.' [23]

The inhabitants of Deerlijk erected a monument, shown in Figure 48.143, at the Saint Columba church, with the names of the soldiers from Deerlijk who died during WWI. 'Verhaeghe Maurice' is listed as the penultimate in the first column.

As was often the case with soldiers who lived in a municipality different from where they were born, one paid little attention to this young man after the war. Maurice's remains were never found, which made his brothers and sisters' beaten wounds particularly deep.

A few lines of text as a comment in the registers of the deaths in Deerlijk, shown in Figure 48.144, was, until now, the only written document witnessing his life and death.

48.9.5.4.2 Birth in Harelbeke and the family settled in Deerlijk Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe was a son of Theophile Verhaeghe (born in Klauwenhoek in Sint Eloois Vijve in 1863) and Marie Louise de Vos (born in Molsten in Wielsbeke in 1859).

He was born in Harelbeke in 1892, in Figure 48.146.

His parents married in Wielsbeke in 1884.

On his father's side, Maurice was related to a soldier of Napoleon, Berbaerd Verhaeghe, as described further in Chapter 48.9.5.4.6 and Chapter 48.9.2.3.1.

In contrast, on his mother's side, he had Spanish ancestors, including Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and his son Antoni Desclergue (DC06), both soldiers from Montblanc in Tarragona, Spain, as described at the beginning of his chapter. In particular, Maurice's mother, Marie Louise de Vos, was a descendant of Petrus de Vos (DC08by2) from Harelbeke, the son of Joannes de Vos and Joana Catharina Declergz (DC08b). The latter was indeed a granddaughter of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), responsible for constructing the chapel Kapel-ter-Ruste in Deerlijk around 1639. The Spanish look is noticeable in several of Marie Louise's descendants.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Harelbeke, shown in Figure 48.145, was known for the many masons, while Deerlijk was known for its weavers.

Older people often talked about fights between both communities when a weaver's son seduced a bricklayer's daughter or vice versa. It was during this period that Maurice's youth took place.

48.9.5.4.3 Soldier during WWI An impression of Deerlijk at the early stages of World War I is shown in Figure 48.147. We begin with facts found in the journal Derlike, written by Laurent Tack and Laurent Tack with Luc Adams, which provide a detailed

He had a brother in the army. He did not need to join the military, as was declared on September 30, 1911. However, we know that he joined voluntarily in 1914.*

In uw gebeden en Heilige Offers denk aan de Ziel van

Heer JULES RIGOLLE

echtgenoot van Mevrouw IRMA DEJAEGERE

geboren te Wortegem, op 18 juni 1894 en godvruchtig overleden te Deerlijk, op 18 juli 1963, gesterkt door de Genademiddelen van onze Moeder de Heilige Kerk.

Oud-strijder van de oorlog 1914-1918. - Vuurkruiser.
Lid van de Bond van het Heilig Hart.

„Uw Wil geschiede op aarde als in de hemel" dit is een van de beden van het Onze Vader die we evenzeer in blijde als in droevige omstandigheden van het leven tot God richten.

We treuren om het afsterven van een goede Echtgenoot en Vader, een dierbare Vriend, niet als van door het lot geslagenen, maar met de moed en het vertrouwen op Gods wijsheid van christene mensen.

Na onverdroten arbeid en zorg voor zijn gezin, hopend nog lange jaren een welverdiende rust aan de zijde van zijn trouwe echtgenote te mogen genieten, en leven in zijn vriendenkring, is hij thans bestemd voor de Eeuwige Rust bij de Heer.

Dierbare Echtgenote, mijn goede Kinderen en Kleinkinderen, ik heb voor U allen steeds geprobeerd een voorbeeld te geven van trouw aan onze godsdienst, van werkzaamheid en plichtsvervulling. Vergeet dit niet. Houdt van elkander en weest een troost voor moeder die thans alleen achterblijft. Gedenkt mij in uwe gebeden, ik blijf met U verenigd in liefde. Ik reken op uw hulp opdat ik spoedig moge bij de Heer zijn.

Vaartwel, Familieleden, Vrienden en Strijdmakkers. Tot weerziens, ik reken op uwe gebeden.

account of the wartime experiences in Deerlijk.[24][25][26][27]

On August 22, 1914, the first German troops, consisting of cavalry or uhlanen from neighboring Vichte, arrived in Deerlijk. They departed soon after, as German forces moved southward to engage the Allies. On September 8, 1914, 25 reconnaissance troops, hussars or huzaren, depicted in Figure 48.164, arrived. During this period, Belgian soldiers and police officers managed to capture some Germans, leading to a notable incident resulting in the death of Carl Trunk, a German soldier. Despite this resistance, the Germans did not retaliate against Deerlijk, likely because a wounded German soldier declared that Belgian military personnel, not civilians, were responsible for his injuries.

The German occupation of Deerlijk began on October 17, 1914. By the war's end, Maurice Verhaeghe died at Langemark, and another Deerlijk soldier, Evarist Dejager, died at Moorslede. Maurice Verhaeghe's name appears on war monuments in both Harelbeke and Deerlijk. Notably, he was not listed among the killed soldiers of the Flanders Fields Museum in 2004. Jules Rigolle, who witnessed Maurice's death, played a crucial role in ensuring that his death was officially recorded on December 3, 1925[28]. The obituary of Jules Rigolle is shown in Figure 48.150.

Maurice Verhaeghe did not initially appear in military archives, and Leon Defraeye omitted him from his 1932 list of killed soldiers. His name was eventually added to the Deerlijk monument erected in 1952. According to Laurent Tack, Maurice was erroneously declared dead on May 16, 1915, and some registers were not updated, leading to confusion with another soldier of the same name from Torhout.

Laurent Tack and Luc Adams reviewed documents indicating Maurice Verhaeghe was treated in an English hospital in 1915. This period of hospitalization, during which he was mistakenly declared dead, allowed him to establish connections with the Strickland family in London, evidenced by his niece Rachelle Verhaeghe's later marriage to Mr. Strickland.

Maurice was neither buried in Kaaskerke nor De Panne, likely due to confusion with the Torhout soldier. The British liberation of Deerlijk from October 18 to 20, 1918, was marked by intense fighting, resulting in significant civilian casualties due to German artillery fire from the Schelde River valley. Deerlijk lost 11 soldiers in 1918, with 12 others killed between August 4 and October 17, 1914, and five more before the year's end. Before the war, Maurice Verhaeghe worked as a mason with his father.

Unmarried, he enlisted as a war volunteer on August 3, 1914. By October 2, 1914, he joined the 2nd regiment of carabiniers, deployed to defend Antwerp. The Battle of the Nete began on October 2, 1914, with the Germans advancing to Antwerp's fortresses by October 5, 1914, equally described in Chapter 64.7.1.6.5.

GUSTAAF VAN NIEUWENHUIJSE
geboren te Harelbeke, de 18 maart 1887 en godvruchtig overleden te Wielsbeke de 9 juli 1963 voorzien van de H. Sacramenten der stervenden.
Lid van de H. Hartebond — K. A. V. — en andere bestaande Genootschappen.

Na een leven van hard werken voor haar kinderen en een lange lijdensweg is moeder naar de hemel gegaan. God, hiervan is ieder die U eert overtuigt: als hij in zijn leven beproefd wordt, zal hij worden gekroond; als hij mocht in kwelling zijn, zal hij worden bevrijd, want gij vindt geen behagen in ons verderf, maar na storm geeft gij rust en na droefheid weer blijdschap. (Tobias)

In een totale overgave aan Gods H. Wil heeft zij haar drie jaren lange ziekte aanvaard. Zoals zoveel mensen was de duurbare overledene de woorden van Christus indachtig: „ Vader indien het mogelijk is laat deze lijdenskelk mij voorbijgaan, evenwel niet mijn wil maar uw wil geschiede. „ Zij heeft aanvaard en met volle betrouwen haar ziel in de handen van God gegeven.

Dierbare KINDEREN en KLEINKINDEREN, het leven brengt voor ieder mens een kruisweg mee; draagt in liefde en gebed de vele kruisen van het leven en draagt de stempel van de eeuwige verzoening met de barmhartige goedheid. Helpt elkanders lasten dragen omdat niemand onder Gods gerechtige uitspraak bezwijke. Het goede dat ik in U heb volbracht weze het onderpand voor uw genegenheid die met mijn heengaan niet mag gebroken worden.

Mijn geliefde dochter ik dank U om de nooit ontziene zorgen gedurende mijn lange slepende ziekte. Gij waart aan het ziekbed mijn grootste vreugde, Gij waart in een woord goed voor mij.

Vaarwel, dierbare familieleden, nu zal ik weer gelukkig bij vader zijn. Een vurig gebed voor mij is het bewijs van uw trouwe liefde.

H. Hart van Jezus brandend van liefde tot ons, ontvlam ons hart van liefde tot U. 500 d. afl.

Maurice, injured on October 6, 1914, spent the subsequent months in a military hospital, missing the retreat from Antwerp to the Yser and the Battle of the Yser. He rejoined his regiment on February 7, 1915, after being discharged from the hospital on December 20, 1914. He was again injured in May 1915 and briefly hospitalized.

In 1916, Maurice transferred to the 4th regiment of Carabiniers, formed after the army's reorganization at the Yser River. He served with the 56th company Troupes auxiliaires du génie (T.A.G.) before returning to the 4th carabiniers. His regiment participated in various operations, including guarding Nieuwpoort and replacing British divisions in Brielen.

On September 28, 1918, Maurice was killed during an offensive to liberate Passchendaele. His battalion continued to advance, reaching De Ruiter by October 5 and subsequently moving through several locations until the ceasefire on November 11, 1918. Maurice's service at the front lasted four years, one month, and 27 days, excluding his hospitalization during the winter of 1914-1915.

Remarkably, Maurice Verhaeghe did not appear in the military archives, and Leon Defraeye forgot to mention him in his 1932 list of killed soldiers.

His name now appears on the monument in Deerlijk, erected in 1952, but was absent from earlier memorials.

According to an appendix by Laurent Tack, Maurice Verhaeghe had once been mistakenly declared dead on May 16, 1915. Some registers never corrected this error, leading to post-war confusion between two soldiers named Maurice Verhaeghe. Documents reviewed by Laurent Tack and Luc Adams revealed that Maurice had been treated in an English hospital in 1915, where he was erroneously declared dead shortly after.

His temporary residence in England is corroborated by subsequent family events and his involvement in underground activities during both World Wars. It was during this time that Maurice became acquainted with the Strickland family. His brother's daughter, Rachelle Verhaeghe, would later marry Mr. Strickland from London.

Maurice Verhaeghe was not buried in Kaaskerke or De Panne. Earlier mistakes resulted from confusion with another Maurice Verhaeghe from Torhout, who died in 1915. During the British liberation of Deerlijk from October 18 to October 20, 1918, significant fighting occurred, causing civilian casualties due to German artillery from the Schelde River valley.

Deerlijk lost 24 civilians on October 20, 1918, and 11 soldiers died in 1918.

Between August 4, 1914, and October 17, 1914, 12 soldiers were killed, with five more casualties before the end of 1914.

Maurice Verhaeghe's early wartime service began when he enlisted as a war volunteer on August 3, 1914. He was part of the 2nd regiment of carabiniers, defending Antwerp during the Battle of the Nete. In Figure 48.148, we see the 2nd regiment of carabiners who withdraw from the Nete to Antwerp in the days after October 2, 1914.

After sustaining injuries, he spent time in a military hospital, missing key battles. Upon recovery, he returned to the front lines on October 20 and rejoined the 2nd and 4th regiment of carabiners, shown in Figure 48.149. His regiment was involved in critical operations, including the defense of Nieuwpoort and participation in the liberation of Passchendaele, where Maurice was ultimately killed. We also refer the reader to Chapter 48.10 for more details about the death declaration and the link with England.

Throughout his service, Maurice displayed exceptional bravery and dedication. Despite early administrative errors and the chaos of war, his legacy endures. His story, meticulously documented through historical records and family accounts, highlights the sacrifices made by soldiers like Maurice Verhaeghe during World War I. His name, now honored on monuments, serves as a poignant reminder of the cost of war and the valor of those who fought.

48.9.5.4.4 Distinctions Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe, proudly posing in Figure 48.149, received several distinguished honors throughout his military career. His dedication and bravery in service were recognized through numerous accolades, reflecting his exceptional contributions during World War I.

On September 28, 1918, Maurice Verhaeghe tragically lost his life in Langemark during the final liberation assault on the German forces. His valor and commitment to duty were evident through the distinctions he earned.

As a testament to his front-line service, he was awarded the prestigious 7 chevrons de front (front stripes or front chevrons).

Posthumously, Maurice Verhaeghe was honored with the Victory Medal and the Médaille Commémorative de la Guerre 1914-1918. These medals commemorated his participation and sacrifices in the Great War, underscoring the significance of his contributions to the Allied victory.

Furthermore, he received the Knight's Cross with Palms from the Order of Leopold II, a high honor recognizing his outstanding bravery and leadership. Additionally, he was awarded the Croix de Guerre, further highlighting his heroism in the face of adversity[29].

[29] Royal Decree of April 8, 1928, no 24561.

The medals of Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe, depicted in Figure 48.151, are enduring symbols of his courage, dedication, and the ultimate sacrifice he made for his country. His legacy is a poignant reminder of the bravery exhibited by soldiers who fought valiantly during World War I.

48.9.5.4.5 Meanwhile, at the Homefront in Deerlijk Various studies were performed in the past on the events in Deerlijk at the beginning of the war, for instance, by Philippe Despriet[30]. When the war had started, Deerlijk remained tranquil. Many young men were soldiers and fought the Germans in the East and North, while the people from Deerlijk had to make do with reading the newspapers and praying in the Chapel Kapel-ter-Ruste. Indeed, the fear of death makes people very religious.

Unfortunately, humility often evaporates after the events and is replaced by vanity and a high hat.

On August 22, 1914, German soldiers arrived in Deerlijk for the first time. French troops spotted nine Uhlans led by Count von Schwerin in Deerlijk. These French informed the pastor of Desselgem (Coussement).

The Germans were also spotted in Harelbeke and Kuurne. Citizens of Deerlijk informed Desselgem of the arrival of the Germans on Sunday, August 23, at 9:30 pm.

The population panicked when they learned that the Germans were arresting or shooting all men they encountered. The story was incorrect, but it was a reason to flee on Monday, August 24. The day is remembered as Lopersmaandag (Runner Monday)[31]. The events of August 24 formed a domino effect. Men fled west; they told the story in every congregation they encountered, and the local men ran. However, German troops retreated, and nothing happened. Somewhat embarrassed, the men returned home on Monday evening.

On August 25, a German stole a horse in Deerlijk. He had stopped a rider, Cyrille Dewulf, and taken his horse. Cyrille, therefore, complained to the constable. The German told him he would pay for the horse. This was very strange, but the German returned the horse the next day.

The mayor of Deerlijk, Theophile Renier, received several orders to carry out on August 29. Inns had to close at 9:00 pm, and the Belgian flags had to remain on the official buildings. All refugees from Brussels had to go to Sint Niklaas, and wounded soldiers had to be sent to Antwerp when healed.

The Germans did not initially occupy every street but limited their attention to the front line and village surveys.

The first encounter occurred on September 8 at a farm in Deerlijk in the Desselgemstraat. A mixed gang of Belgian civilians, gendarmes, and French soldiers attacked a German patrol.

People were killed in the attack, but they were unable to overpower the Germans wholly. For that reason, the population was very concerned because they expected reprisals. Also, the attackers had all disguised themselves as civilians by wearing their vests inside out, not to be recognized immediately. As a result, they feared that the Germans would believe civilians had attacked them, which was precarious for the locals.

Indeed, usually, the Germans then started murdering and destroying.

Police officer Alois Ameye collected all weapons from the civilian population. When he had confiscated all the guns, he wrote a report stating that not a single civilian had shot at the Germans but the military.

On September 10, the Belgian government announced that the refugees in Deerlijk could leave for England while soldiers were all sent to Antwerp.

On Thursday, September 10, 1914, there was a second encounter in Deerlijk around 10:30 am. Twelve German soldiers on horseback and five by bicycle rode from Vichte to Deerlijk. These soldiers took the bend in Deerlijk, in the station's direction, then Sint Lodewijk, and then Heestert and Avelgem, where they joined their unit in Berchem. However, when these Germans arrived at the spruce forest in Deerlijk, somebody shot them at the Heirweg to Kortrijk. There were deaths, and the Germans again had not seen military uniforms. Harsh reprisals were bound to follow. The Germans then set fire to some farms. Buildings, equipment, and supplies went up in flames. There was also a civilian casualty.

The Germans tried to ask the pastor to explain the shootings that had taken place in Deerlijk, but the pastor Aimé Dieudonné Desmedt had fled.

The villagers further hid this fact during the war. After the war, however, writer Stijn Streuvels (Frank Lateur), who had been, almost like a real journalist, on inspection in the area during the events of that period and who wrote everything in a book, reported in his testimony that the pastor had, indeed, fled. Later research by Philippe Despriet in the documents of neighboring parishes provided ample evidence. The pastor had certainly run to another parish, namely to Desselgem. He arrived there on September 10, with his two maids, in the parish, filled with fear. After they arrived in Desselgem, the three fled on to Oostrozebeke. Joseph Coussement would be his successor in Deerlijk.

On that same day, there was also an event in Sint Lodewijk. Indeed, Romain Bulcaen[32] writes that the newly installed priest of Sint Lodewijk, namely Louis Rommel[33] was stopped by a German patrol when he left his church on September 10, 1914. The Germans asked him for directions to Waregem. He was so shocked that he could hardly speak. Therefore, he was arrested but would be released soon after.

Concerning the events in Deerlijk, the Germans indeed planned to take revenge. They sent part of their army unit in Berchem to Deerlijk to eradicate the village. Stijn Streuvels sensed the disaster and had already commented about it in his diary on September 8. On the evening of September 10, an entire army unit passed through Ingooigem, from Berchem to Deerlijk. It was a huge column, soldiers in front, heavy artillery in the back, followed by an ambulance. The people in Ingooigem had intensely mixed feelings. On the one hand, they were happy that the unit passed by and left them alone. On the other hand, they feared what was to come to Deerlijk.

The inhabitants of Deerlijk came together in their houses. It was as if they felt death approaching. They hid precious items in wells and cellars. They heard the Germans approaching in the distance on the cobbled road from Vichte to Deerlijk. The Germans made the situation even more terrifying by asking people how far Deerlijk was and that they were on their way to destroy the municipality.

Meanwhile, in Deerlijk, the atmosphere turned hushed. Cows mooed, dogs barked, and frogs croaked. In the distance, they heard the Germans marching to Deerlijk.

There was one missing soldier from the day that the firing in Deerlijk took place among the Germans. However, fortunately, the Germans found this soldier on their way to Deerlijk. His testimony confirmed that the Germans had not shot at Civilians but by the military. This testimony saved the population. The 1300 soldiers were ordered to return to Berchem immediately. Deerlijk was saved from destruction! For the residents, it was like a miracle. They were convinced that there had been intercession by Onze Lieve Vrouw ter Ruste. The chapel, described in Chapter 49, founded by Antoni Desclergue (DC06) in 1639, with substantial support from Marguerite Kelduwier, was once again in the middle of the war scene. From that moment on, daily pilgrimages to the chapel took place.

[33] Rommel was Flemish, despite his name.

Deerlijk remained unoccupied until October 15, 1914. This meant that, despite the presence of German soldiers in the region, the village of Deerlijk remained under the authority of the Belgian government until that date.

During this interim period, Deerlijk received orders and instructions from the Belgian government almost daily. For example, the outrages of the Germans had to be reported, and German and Austrian subjects had to be arrested. Food convoys were not allowed to move in the direction of German-occupied territories. The public lighting had to be switched off at 9:00 pm on September 21 so German blimps would not find a passage easily. The meat price was fixed, and the authorities claimed grain. On October 1, doctor Isebaert of Deerlijk warned that Typhus had broken out among the refugees. Influential pieces of art in Deerlijk had to be stored safely. It may be a miracle that the polychrome panels in the Kapel-ter-Ruste were never stolen or damaged during this period. The well-known Sint Columba retable in Deerlijk was also hidden but was later damaged during the shelling in 1918.

Alcohol was banned, and lists of cows, horses, grain, wheat, and the like were made to claim these goods, if necessary, for the Belgian army or the armies of friendly nations like England or France. On October 7, the authorities begged all men between 18 and 30 to become war volunteers and go to Ostend's military depot. It is admirable that 310 years after the liberation of Ostend, this city was again central to a military story. On October 10, all motorized traffic was banned, which was the last Belgian warrant found at Deerlijk town hall. After that, the municipality fell into German hands.

Deerlijk was relatively far from the front, so life could go its ordinary course despite the occupation and to the extent possible. The Verhaeghe-de Vos family, like many other families in Deerlijk, was the residence of a German soldier, as ordered by the government. When we consider Schuwe Maandag[34] and the front lines of German soldiers who, according to their Schlieffen plan, wanted to conquer France within four weeks in August of 1914, to be able to attack Russia afterward, and therefore mercilessly punished any opposition or delay in Belgium with massacres, it is hard to imagine that there were also civilized Germans. The family was fortunate to have given shelter to a well-mannered soldier. His name was Josef Schmidt, from Ilshofe, between Stuttgart and Nuremberg. This soldier, shown in Figure 48.153, had little to do with hostilities, as he was a shoemaker and responsible for repairing the shoes of the German soldiers. Theophile Verhaeghe's workshop was perfectly usable as a military shoemaker and was confiscated by the Germans. Josef, however, behaved very respectably throughout the war.

Occasionally, he could arrange extra rations so that the daughters in the family would not starve. The mutual respect was seen by the friendship between the two families, which lasted for many decades. Contact was maintained long after WWII even, and occasional visits took place. Josef Schmidt's legacy lived on in his adoptive son Emile Bayer and his grandson Wolfgang.

The fact that the inhabitants of Deerlijk had to continue to work to have bread on the table, despite the occupation, is also evident from a 1917 work permit from Zozyma Verhaeghe, Maurice's sister, shown in Figure 48.187 on page 963.

At the same time, during the war in Deerlijk, 250 local young men (aged between 17 and 30) were also forcibly recruited as civilian workers.

Germans took them to Sedan and Charleville-Mézières, where they had to work in the timber industry for the German war apparatus. One of them was Gerard Vangheluwe, who would marry Zozyma Verhaeghe after the war and become the brother-in-law of the late Maurice Verhaeghe. The story is described in Chapter 69.

Gerard claimed all his life that he had not been randomly selected as a civilian worker but that local people who had to choose on behalf of the occupier didn't like him. Gerard had once climbed the church tower as a child, after which the fire brigade had to free him. His mother was Marie Nathalie Surmont, the sister of Eduard Camille Surmont. The latter was a friend of the poet René Declercq and is described in 'Harmen Riels' in 1913 as Kroeksken who once troubled the local pastor involving snowballs. Where the name 'Kroeksken' came from can be found in Chapter 69.

Philippe Despriet described the events during the war further in Derlike[35].

When the Germans took over authority in Deerlijk, many civilians were obliged to give shelter to the Germans, including the Verhaeghes, as mentioned above. Again, all goods, including sugar and alcoholic drinks, were listed. The Germans forced bars to close. The Germans placed the men under house arrest, who the Belgian state could claim as soldiers.

They confiscated all horses. In the following winter, there was a shortage of people. The inhabitants also stole a lot of wood from forests and gardens to heat homes. Deerlijk had entered a dark period, comparable to many periods in the 16th and 17th centuries during the civil wars in the Low Countries. For instance, a forest at Sint Lodewijk was cut and transformed into farmland. Romain Bulcaen[36] writes that this was the forest called 'Harelbekehout' and used to be the size of 9 ha before the war. In the same reference, we can also read that, on October 20, 1916, the German Emperor Kaiser Wilhelm II attended a military parade at Banhout forest. The German military guarded every road junction on this occasion, and the inhabitants were ordered to shut their window blinds. The Germans also took the pastorie of Saint Louis, used it as a Casino, and did not show exemplary behavior. Many photo cards of the casino with Germans posing, as in Figure 48.152. They loved sending such pictures back home, probably to show they were totally in control.

As Romain Bulcaen described, the German occupation of Saint Louis was a constant reality until October 15, 1918. On that day, the villagers noticed that Germans began to retreat and took ammunition with them. The Germans also passed through the village, from West to East, and herded sheep and goats. The Germans requested the young men to follow their retreat. It's not sure if they intended to use them as hostages or if they were afraid they might reinforce the Allied troops while reconquering Belgium.

By dawn on Sunday, October 20, the Allies crossed the Leie River between Kortrijk and Desselgem. The British crossed the Leie River at Beveren-Leie close to the border with Harelbeke[37]. In Chapter 49, the reader will see that a few centuries before, the Spanish and later the French had chosen the exact location as a bridgehead and to install barracks. The area served the military very well, and history repeats itself.

A mas occurred at dawn at Sint Lodewijk, while one could hear shells from a distance. By 9 o'clock, the Germans fled in panic. By 10:30, the first British military arrived in Sint Lodewijk. Then, the Germans began to assault Saint Louis. The church encountered numerous shells. A shell hit the sacristy of the church. All the windows were broken, except the one above the hoogkoor in which we can still read that the inhabitants of Saint Louis constructed the church. The German assault killed seven people and wounded 15.

The German bombardment did not damage the organ. In Chapter 72.4.9, we read that our ancestor, Sidonie Verbeke, wife of Camillus Waelkens, was killed in Vichte (next to Saint Louis) on October 31, 1918. She died for her country. We don't know any other details, but she likely died after being shot or hit by a shell. She was 65 years old.

On November 10, when a ceasefire was announced for the next day, everyone was thrilled, and, according to Bulcaen, the British played 'Blessed be God' (Offertory Hymn) in the Church.

48.9.5.4.6 Life after WWI All of Maurice Verhaeghe's surviving siblings eventually married. His sister Zozyma, for example, married Gerard Vangheluwe on July 20, 1921; the couple first lived in the center of Deerlijk and moved to Kalsyde naar St-Louis in the late 1920s, better known today as Stationsstraat. Zozyma would work all her life as a self-employed Haute couturière of ceremonial dresses.
Two sisters went to live in Brussels (Etterbeek and Sint Jans Molenbeek), one in Wielsbeke. The others stayed in Deerlijk or Harelbeke.
The families with whom the Verhaeghes married were Caby, Demeyere, Eeckhout, Delrue, Plasse, Simoens, Vangheluwe, Van Houtven, and Van Nieuwenhuyze.
After the war, the family searched in vain for Maurice. His body is most likely buried namelessly. On August 26, 1924, a letter was sent to the family by the military burial service[38], stating that Maurice was buried in De Panne and that the army had taken his body from Kaaskerke. It would be grave number N76.
Upon further investigation, however, it turned out to be a mistake. Another Maurice Verhaeghe was buried there, someone from the 2nd regiment Jagers te Voet, who died in 1915.
Who knows, Maurice may be buried in the unknown soldier's grave in Brussels - we don't know. His brothers and sisters always kept a place in the house for a photo of Maurice. They all died a few decades ago.
The Verhaeghes, reasonably fluent in German and French, who had spread from Marke to Brussels during the interbellum and on both sides of the Leie River, formed an ideal mini-network during WWII for underground activities and connections to the resistance. We only know vague stories and single incidents during WWII. Therefore, this chapter in the life of the Verhaeghes is skipped in our book, apart from some vague facts mentioned further.
The war records of Maurice Verhaeghe are listed in Figures 48.154, 48.155, 48.156, 48.157 and48.158.

48.9.5.5 Other Descendants of Theophile Verhaeghe and Marie Louise de Vos

The list of children is shown above. Here, we have collected a few pictures and memorabilia not offered in other sections. They are found in Figures 48.159, 48.160, 48.161, 48.162, and 48.163.

48.10 Verhaeghe: Pioneering Liberalism, Socialism, Resistance, and Education

This section aims to objectively portray the socio-psycho-economic world of the Verhaeghes within a historical context. Unlike the numerous heroic narratives that emerged post-World War II, this work is neither a cinematic venture nor a romantic novel. Due to the subject's sensitive nature, we will not assert definitive facts, evidence, or conclusions.
Instead, the approach gently describes the context and offers insinuations, allowing the reader to engage with the material imaginatively.
The details provided here are intended to serve as a foundation for future historians who may delve into the detailed daily reports and records of Deerlijk and its surrounding villages during the World Wars. The family knows the names of individuals and families in Deerlijk, Harelbeke, Waregem, and Kortrijk who were traitors and collaborators with the Germans. However, the book tells our story, not that of the traitors.

Therefore, certain critical aspects of the narrative necessitate a degree of vagueness.

The author, possessing a slow yet enduring memory, has compiled stories heard during childhood from great-grandparents, great-granduncles and aunts, grandparents, and acquaintances. These recollections have been placed within a historical framework, allowing bits and pieces to coalesce into this chapter.

Notably, the author's great-grandmother, Zozyma Verhaeghe, could converse for hours, sharing her tales with anyone willing to listen. As a child, the author was an attentive listener, profoundly respecting the elders and their rich stories.

A vague yet insightful reconstruction is possible by situating these reports within their historical context.

This chapter, therefore, represents memories and historical context, providing a nuanced glimpse into the lives of the Verhaeghes during the war. It invites readers to explore and imagine the untold details, fostering a deeper understanding of this family's journey through one of history's most tumultuous periods.

48.10.1 The Importance of Deerlijk

The village of Deerlijk frequently appears in this book. In particular, in the years 1600 and from the second half of the 18th century onwards, it's been a place that played quite an essential role in our ancestry.

Apart from this, Deerlijk is one of the cradles of ideas and innovations in Flanders. It could rightfully be called a revolutionary village. Indeed, centered between rural villages and the Leie River, relatively close to Kortrijk and on the edge of the castellany of Kortrijk and near that of Oudenaarde, Deerlijk has played an important economic role, in particular in the textile industry.

A healthy mix of workers, catholic farmers, liberal and catholic industrials, numerous pubs, and many immigrants from surrounding villages have molded Deerlijk into a hub and fireplace of ideas.

We can mention the Renier family, the Verriest family, René Declercq, several important priests, politicians, influential industrials, and countless others. Many are covered, for instance, in the journal Derlike, published by Heemkring Dorp en Toren.

It's not an understatement to say that Deerlijk has played a pioneering role in education, particularly for workers' children. As a result, Deerlijk has had a high percentage of literate people in the past two hundred years or more.

48.10.2 The Personages in the Verhaeghe Network

Here, we focus on one particular family that played a role, perhaps significantly, in the first half of the 20th century.

In particular, we are referring to the descendants of Edouard Verhaeghe (Waregem 1821 - Kortrijk 1907) and Ursula Baert (Sint Eloois Vijve 1828 - Harelbeke 1867), described in Chapter 48.9.2.3.4. The couple was married in Sint Eloois Vijve in 1857 and had two sons, namely Theophile Verhaeghe (Sint Eloois Vijve 1863 - Deerlijk 1926) and Jules Verhaeghe (Sint Eloois Vijve 1858 - Harelbeke 1911).

Jules had a son, Julien (Harelbeke 1895 - Spiere 1932), two other sons, and one daughter. The two men, Theophile and Jules, were very dynamic, like their ancestors, and would transfer this mentality to their descendants.

Theophile Verhaeghe married Marie Louise De Vos, while Jules Verhaeghe married Maria Theresia Libeert.

The Verhaeghe family, navigating the complex socio-economic landscape of Belgium around 1900, exemplified a unique blend of liberalism and socialism, influenced by social and moral convictions.

At the core of the Verhaeghe family's ethos were principles of freedom of thought and speech, liberal ideas, and a robust sense of solidarity. These values, deeply embedded in their psychological makeup, fostered a strong personality that resisted societal slachtoffers van een jammerlijkst werkongeval, in 't saswater van Spiere-Helkijn, den 4 Augustus 1932.

De gemeente, zoo dikwerf reeds beroerd, dees jaar, door pijnlijke sterfgevallen, moest weeral opgeschrikt! helaas!... Men roept... Men kermt luidop, doch welhaast fluistert men nog even... de diepste smart immers is stom... tot alle gejammer zich uitboezemt, in ééne enkele... teedere klacht die, zuchtend, gaat over de gansche gemeente «Die ongelukkige Julien :... Die arme weduwe... die schamele kindertjes !...

Want ja, het beweende slachtoffer is helaas onze fraaie Julien, die voorbeeldige Christen, die trouwe Echtgenoot; die minnende Vader. Ja, onze vlijtige Julien, zoo uiterst verslaafd voor vrouw en kinderen, van den vroegen morgen tot den laten avond. Blijmoedig verliet hij hen, op den dag des onheils, op zoek naar hun dagelijksch brood en hij vond er helaas... zijn eigen droevige dood... Die ongelukkige Julien!...

Ongelukkig? o Kleingeloovigen : God weet het beter. Hij schonk hem reeds, als opperste loon, de eeuwige kroon der onsterfelijkheid. Begroeten wij hem dus met ontdekten hoofde en ook omdat alwie bezwijkt, als slachtoffer van zijn plicht, moet beschouwd worden, als gevallen op het veld van eer.

Beminde Echtgenoote : Ik weet het, geen mensch ooit zal u kunnen troosten; doch zie op tot den Heer! Hij zorgt voor de vogeltjes der lucht en de kruidjes der aarde. Hoe zou Hij dus eene doodbedrukte moeder en vaderlooze kindertjes kunnen verlaten? de moeder, 't meesterwerk van zijne schepping; de kindertjes de gezegende vrucht der reine liefde? Geloof dus en hoop.

Teedere Kindertjes : Blijft Moeder steeds eeren, beminnen, gehoorzamen en gij zult ook steeds gelukkig zijn met haar.

Beste Broeder en Zusters: Schoonouders, -broeders en -zusters : In mijnen doodsangst smeekte ik u en van hierboven roep ik u: Blijft toch steeds waken over mijne zoo diepbeproefde Echtgenoote en mijne vijf... onnoozele schaapjes. Zij zijn en blijven, naast God, mijn grootste schat.

De menschen komen soms zelfzuchtig voor, onverschillig en ongevoelig zelfs; doch 't is maar in den schijn; want de smertelijke beproeving die eene onzer achtbare familiën komt te treffen, bewijst, ten eerste, wat diep medelijden er verborgen ligt in den grond van 's menschen hert en ten tweede, hoe innig de banden zijn, die ons allen ondereen samensnoeren. Vandaar die lange doodsche rouwstoet; die stille diepe smart, rond het stoffelijk overblijfsel van onzen duurbaren Julien, voorbeeldig lid eener kroostrijke familie, die zoo trouw zijne christelijke plichten kweet; zoo rechtschapen was van hert, zoo vreedzaam van geest en daarbij zoo stil en huiselijk aangelegd en die helaas... zoo vroegtijdig en zoo gewelddadig aan de liefde der zijnen en ons aller achting werd onttrokken.

Dierbare Familieleden, diepbeproefde Moeder vooral: schaamt U niet uw overstelpt gemoed in bittere tranen te ontlasten. Jesus weende ook over zijnen vriend Lazarus, doch gelooft vast, dat die Jesus, zooals Hij eens Lazarus uit het graf deed verrijzen, uwen duurbaren Julien, ook reeds tot het eeuwig leven heeft doen verrijzen; want het dagelijksch werk aan Gode opgedregen, is in zijne oogen een voortdurend gebed.

Beminde Ouders, Beminde Moeder vooral : 't viel mij hard U zoo vroegtijdig te moeten verlaten, en toen ik bovenmenschelijke pogingen aanwendde om mij te redden, dan was het ook, ja dan was het toch ook om Uwentwil. Doch ik heb ook tot God geroepen en... weest gerust, samen met mijnen Meester ben ik uit de diepten van den vloed, opgestegen tot de hoogten van den Hemel.

Dierbare Broeders, Zuster, Schoonbroeder en -zuster: Gij kent mijn verleden: Ik zeg U en ik mag het U zeggen: volgt mijn voorbeeld en weest trouw in den dienst van God en van de menschen. Liefste Meter : leef lang nog en gelukkig. — Beste Werkmakkers: gedenkt de leus "Arbeid adelt„ constraints, rigid systems, traditions, and dogmas. This intrinsic belief in personal freedom and moral autonomy shaped their worldview and guided their actions.

Despite being drawn towards socialism, the Verhaeghes' entrepreneurial behavior revealed their liberal inclinations. Around the turn of the century, Belgium was experiencing significant economic and industrial growth, which presented new opportunities and challenges. The Verhaeghes' engagement in entrepreneurial activities reflected their liberal ideology, emphasizing individual initiative, economic freedom, and self-reliance.

Their liberalism, however, was not synonymous with capitalism. Unlike capitalists prioritizing profit maximization and capital accumulation, the Verhaeghes balanced their entrepreneurial spirit with a solid commitment to social justice and solidarity. This distinction underscores a nuanced understanding of liberalism that values personal freedom and economic initiative while rejecting the excesses of capitalist exploitation.

The socio-economic context of early 20th-century Belgium was marked by significant inequality and social unrest. Industrialization had created stark divisions between the working class and the bourgeoisie, leading to widespread calls for social reform. The Verhaeghes, influenced by the prevailing conditions and their sense of solidarity, found resonance in socialist ideals that advocated for workers' rights and social equity.

Their attraction to socialism can be seen as a pragmatic response to the socio-economic realities of their time. It provided a framework to address the injustices and hardships faced by many Belgians, aligning with the Verhaeghes' moral commitment to solidarity and social justice. Yet, their socialism was tempered by their liberal roots, creating a hybrid ideology that sought to harmonize personal freedom with collective welfare.

The Verhaeghe family was also Catholic, adding another layer of complexity. During this period, the Catholic Church in Belgium played a significant role in social and political life, often advocating for conservative values. However, the Verhaeghes' liberal and socialist leanings indicate a selective integration of religious beliefs with their broader ideological commitments.

Their Catholicism provided a moral and ethical framework that complemented their liberal and socialist values. It emphasized the dignity of the individual, the importance of community, and the moral obligation to aid the less fortunate.

Born in Sint Eloois Vijve, the two men, Theophile Verhaeghe and Jules Verhaeghe, married and moved to Harelbeke, where they became construction entrepreneurs after passing through the different levels of bricklayers.

Theophile, at some point, even owned a pub to guarantee a steadier income. Jules worked at an oil mill when the weather was too bad for constructing homes.

Jules died at the age of 52, while his son Julien was merely 16 years old.

The boy and his siblings were further raised by Theophile Verhaeghe and Marie Louise De Vos and became one big family. The family had moved to Deerlijk, a center of the textile industry, but they remained active in the construction branch.

At that time, socialism was gaining momentum in the village and Harelbeke. As described above, the family lost a soldier during WWI, Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe; they had to endure a German soldier in their workshop and home, who luckily turned out to be a friendly man. Soon, there were in-laws.

Zozyma Verhaeghe, daughter of Theophile Verhaeghe, would marry Gerard Vangheluwe, a forced laborer during WWI. The local Wij nodigen u uit tot het afscheidsmoment rond de urne in aula Memoria te Zwevegem (Bekaertstraat 2G (gps nr 3)) op woensdag 6 juli 2022 om 11.30 uur.

Nadien wordt de urne bijgezet in de familiekelder op de begraafplaats te Deerlijk.

Een laatste groet kan gebracht worden in het funerarium van begrafenissen Messiaen-Vandercruyssen, Windhalmlaan 2 te Sint-Lodewijk - Deerlijk, elke werkdag van 15 tot 18.30 uur en op zaterdag van 15 tot 17.30 uur.

Ik heb een steen verlegd in een rivier op aarde
Het water gaat er anders dan voorheen
De stroom van een rivier hou je niet tegen
Het water vindt er altijd een weg omheen
Misschien eens gevuld van sneeuw en regen
Neemt de rivier mijn kiezel met zich mee
Om hem dan glad en rond gesleten
Te laten rusten in de luwte van de zee
Ik heb een steen verlegd in een rivier op aarde
Nu weet ik dat ik nooit zal zijn vergeten
Ik leverde 't bewijs van mijn bestaan
Omdat, door het verleggen van die ene steen
De stroom nooit meer dezelfde weg zal gaan
Ik heb een steen verlegd in een rivier op aarde
Nu weet ik dat ik nooit zal zijn vergeten
Ik leverde 't bewijs van mijn bestaan
Omdat, door het verleggen van die ene steen
Het water nooit dezelfde weg zal gaan.

priest and mayor had chosen him to join the forced labor corps mainly because of his dissident mentality.

His fellows particularly remembered Gerard for taking a salami from the German military butchery at Sedan (France) one day. The whole group was forced to join the feast without leaving any evidence of this 'crime.'

The next day, they all had severe diarrhea.

Gerard had also, on one day, been struck very hard by the butt of a German rifle right on his back. It's been a weak spot for the rest of his life.

During WWI, the Verhaeghe family found themselves in a vital position for espionage by the Belgian army. Indeed, the presence of a German soldier in their home, the particular jobs held by the sons of the family, and the local network they had were essential facilitators.

Indeed, their hero, Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe, was missing. After four years of service on the front line, the Germans killed him at the end of WWI, but it took time for evidence to show up.

The picture shows the children of the joint families Verhaeghe-Devos and Verhaeghe-Libeert, as well as their fiancés, who were still at Deerlijk then. Julien Verhaeghe is remembered in Deerlijk as the father of André Verhaeghe.

48.10.3 Espionage During WWI

The Verhaeghe family, residing in the occupied village of Deerlijk during World War I, found themselves at the epicenter of covert operations against the German military. A shoemaker by trade, described separately in Chapter 48.9.5.4, a German soldier was billeted with the Verhaeghes and utilized their workshop to repair and distribute shoes to the German army. Despite his amiable nature, his presence unwittingly transformed the Verhaeghe home into a hub for espionage activities.

Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe, one of the Verhaeghe sons and a Belgian soldier, became a crucial figure in these covert operations. In 1915, while recuperating at an army hospital in England, Maurice was declared dead, a misconception that played to his advantage. Under the radar, Maurice continued to serve on the Belgian side of the front, utilizing the underground courier mail to stay informed about his family's situation back home.

The Verhaeghes' home, already a hotspot due to the shoemaker's activities, became a fertile ground for gathering intelligence on German military movements. Whether they wanted to or not, the family became privy to sensitive information. This environment and Maurice's unique position laid the groundwork for a sophisticated espionage network.

By 1915, Deerlijk was teeming with espionage activity involving multiple networks. A British secret agent was hiding on a farm between the Verhaeghe residence and the railway at Felix Courtens' farm on Tapuitstraat.

This agent, equipped with a radio, meticulously monitored the railway traffic, noting the direction and composition of German trains. His intelligence was crucial for the Allied forces, providing real-time data on enemy movements.

The Verhaeghes' connection with British intelligence would have long-lasting implications. After the war, Rachelle Verhaeghe, daughter of Medard Verhaeghe, married Mr. A. Strickland, a British national. This union symbolized the enduring bond forged through shared struggles and mutual assistance during the war.

Medard Verhaeghe, a railway employee at the war's onset, leveraged his mobility to support the resistance. His position allowed him to gather and relay vital information about German railway traffic, which was critical for coordinating Allied operations. In Brussels, Clothilde Verhaeghe, married to Mr. Plasse, acted as a pivotal link in the network, ensuring the flow of intelligence between Deerlijk and the capital.

Post-war, the Verhaeghe family maintained connections with notable resistance figures. They became close friends with Joseph Demeyere, a celebrated French resistance hero, and his wife, Leonie. After World War I, Joseph, honored for his bravery, lived in Verdun-le-Vieil during the 1930s. While the exact details of his wartime activities remain unclear, his association with the Verhaeghe family underscores their extensive involvement in resistance efforts. Seraphin René Verhaeghe, another family member, even married Joseph's daughter, further intertwining their fates.

The Verhaeghes' story of espionage is a testament to their resilience and ingenuity. Their covert operations, driven by a deep-seated desire for freedom and justice, played a significant role in the resistance against German occupation. This chapter of their history, rich with intrigue and bravery, adds a compelling dimension to the broader narrative of World War I espionage.

48.10.4 The Network During WWII

The concept of resistance encompasses the determination and actions taken to defy living and operating under the terms imposed by an occupying force. Resistance activities ranged from disrupting enemy operations to simple acts of disobedience. This broad spectrum included propaganda against the enemy, espionage, and underground trade, among other forms.

Post-war narratives often highlight heroic tales that portray the resistance as composed of military partisans engaged in overt acts of defiance.

However, the reality was far more subtle and nuanced.

The Verhaeghe family's resistance efforts exemplify this complexity. Their operations were not limited to direct confrontations with the occupying forces but included extensive involvement in the black market. This dual engagement was strategic; when captured, it was often safer to be convicted of black market activities than to be suspected of participating in covert resistance operations.

The Verhaeghe family's resistance network was extensive, with crucial connections in various locations. While it is challenging to pinpoint the most critical link in their network, the city of Kortrijk played a fundamental role. The family's ties spanned across the Leie River and extended to Brussels, Wetteren, France, and England. However, Kortrijk was a significant hub for their resistance activities.

The Royal Atheneum of Kortrijk was a focal point for resistance efforts in the city, serving as the main cradle of the local resistance. The list of known participants reveals birthdates around 1925, indicating a youthful and dynamic group. The members of this network came from diverse backgrounds, including socialists and pro-British individuals, united by their opposition to fascism.

The White Brigade of Kortrijk was established at the end of 1940 and later became part of the V Liga. It was well-organised. Gustave Naessens was in charge, not only of the Kortrijk sector but, after a while, also of West Flanders. Another influential person was Florent Willems.

The Atheneum cluster, mainly recruited by Maurice Vangilbergen (Kortrijk 1922), consisted of at least the following students as active and establishing members by June 1941: Omer Ballieu (Kortrijk 1924), Lodewijk Zeebrouck (Kortrijk 1926), Achilles Desmet, Adolf Vandamme, André Boucneau, André Fieux (Kortrijk 1920), Lucien Delbaere (Kortrijk 1920), Romain Bonte (Kortrijk 1925), Henri Pannecoucke (Kortrijk 1924), Léon Tieleman (Kortrijk 1922). Petra Demeyere published the list in het thesis.[40] Petra is the daughter of Marcel Demeyere found in the acknowledgments of this book.

We should note that Léon Tieleman was a relative of the police commander of Kortrijk and was well-connected, but he was a student at Sint Amands College in Kortrijk. He formed the Catholic link of the resistance group in Kortrijk and formed connections with Leon Bekaert in Zwevegem.

As a result, many men from Zwevegem, predominantly employees of the Bekaert company, were recruited to join the resistance near the end of World War II. This recruitment effort was facilitated by Tieleman's branch of the resistance, through which Florent Deloof was recruited to lead the White Brigade in Deerlijk.

Deloof enlisted André Verhaeghe from Deerlijk, although Verhaeghe was unaware of the channels through which he had been identified as a candidate for the resistance. The recruitment process was orchestrated from Kortrijk, with André's recommendation originating from a family member known by a nickname that the author vaguely recalls as 'Rotkiv,' possibly derived from a Russian name, or 'Torvik,' perhaps of Norwegian origin, or 'Torvi,' a female variant of the Norse thunder god 'Thor.'

Tieleman himself was known by the moniker 'Lidy.'

Romain Bonte (born in Kortrijk, 1925), listed in Petra Demeyere's publication, was a relative of Jaak Bonte (born in Kortrijk, 1927), who later married Camilla Den Dauw, as described in Chapter 67.9.4.5.

The early resistance efforts were characterized by idealism, focusing on publishing and distributing anti-enemy propaganda. Membership in the resistance was considered a significant and honorable achievement, proudly recorded on various lists. However, this idealism rendered members highly vulnerable to mass arrests, leading many to end up in German prisoner camps.

The Verhaeghe family learned from these early experiences. They realized that maintaining loose contacts was safer and that formal membership in resistance organizations was dangerous and unwise.

Gustave Naessens (born in Deerlijk, 1890) served as the liaison for Zwevegem to the resistance in Kortrijk. He was married to Paula Vandenghinste.

During the early years of the war, a family member who attended school daily in Kortrijk, residing in Deerlijk, frequently visited Saint Louis in Deerlijk, where he later found his bride. After two years of occupation, he left school, leveraged his family network to continue traveling to Kortrijk and Harelbeke, and increasingly crossed the Leie River to Wielsbeke.

The family had connections in Waregem through the farm 'Ter Caysele' (also known as het verbrande hof in Nieuwenhove) and, in the war's final year, also had ties to Le Grèbe in the southwest of Waregem. However, Le Grèbe was generally avoided due to its heavy involvement in an official resistance organization, deemed unnecessarily dangerous based on early war experiences.

The Verhaeghe family shared a keen interest in soccer and bicycle racing during the war. These sports provided ample reasons and occasions to travel extensively, thereby facilitating their covert resistance activities.

The membership of André Verhaeghe (born in Deerlijk, 1922) in the Belgian resistance in 1944 can be traced through crucial family connections in Kortrijk and Waregem. His recruitment into the resistance was swift, driven by his ambition and a somewhat reckless desire to join the militaristic branch of the organization.

While his allocation to the Waregem sector led to relatively minor activities, this geographical assignment likely influenced his survival. Had he been based in Kortrijk, he might have faced more dangerous tasks, potentially leading to his capture or death at the hands of the German occupiers. This hypothetical scenario should not detract from the valor and honor of André Verhaeghe, despite certain disparaging remarks about him in Derlike in 2019. This narrative aims to uphold the integrity of his contributions, as only his wartime activities have been publicized post-war.

The Verhaeghe family formed an essential part of the resistance network during WWII, with several key members facilitating covert operations across different regions.

Medardus Josephus Verhaeghe and Elodie Marie Eeckhout in Marke provided adequate cover to maintain contact with the Royal Atheneum resistance network in Kortrijk. Their residence served as a strategic meeting point and a haven for resistance members.

Guillaume Van Houtven and Elisa Clara Verhaeghe, based in Wetteren, were pivotal in establishing connections with East Flanders and Ghent. Their involvement ensured a broader reach and support for resistance activities across these critical areas.

Gustaaf Vannieuwenhuyze and Marie Leonie Verhaeghe operated a resistance cell in Wielsbeke. Along with their associate Vermeulen, they managed operations on the opposite side of the Leie River, acting as a liaison for trade and other covert activities. An anecdote from their neighbors, Gerard and Maria Verbrugghe - Van den Abeele illustrates the perilous nature of their work. During a German raid, two resistance members hid in an emptied cesspool. The daughters of the household used their wit and charm to distract the German soldiers, preventing a thorough search and thus safeguarding the hidden men.

Their contributions to the resistance were marked by ingenuity and bravery, crucial elements in the broader struggle against German occupation. Through familial networks and strategic positioning, they played a significant role in the resistance movement in Belgium during WWII.

A pivotal encounter in the early 1940s, likely in 1941 or 1942, would leave an indelible mark on the Verhaeghe family's legacy. This event involved a confrontation with a German soldier at a checkpoint on the Leie bridge, a crucial crossing point that was heavily monitored by the occupying forces. The elder Verhaeghe, a seasoned member of the resistance, and his son, often referred to by his nom de guerre Rotkiv, were attempting to cross the bridge under the guise of a routine family visit.

The operation was dangerous, as the German checkpoint guards were notoriously vigilant. To mitigate the risk, the Verhaeghes employed a multifaceted strategy that included several layers of deception. Their first line of defense was the pretense of a family visit, a seemingly innocent reason for their presence that often deflected initial suspicion. However, if this ruse failed, they were prepared to smuggle contraband items such as soap or tobacco, which, while illegal, were less severely punished than resistance activities.

On this particular occasion, the deception nearly unraveled. The German guard, suspicious of their intentions, pressed for more information. Faced with the imminent threat of exposure, the situation escalated. The elder Verhaeghe, recognizing the potential disaster, decided that fighting was the only remaining option. Both father and son engaged the German soldier in a swift and decisive action. The struggle was fierce, and they managed to overpower the guard through a combination of tactical skill and sheer determination. In the ensuing scuffle, they threw him into the river Leie, ensuring their escape but simultaneously drawing heightened scrutiny to their activities.

The repercussions of this daring act were immediate and severe. The elder Verhaeghe, now a wanted man, was forced into hiding to avoid capture and execution. This sudden shift in circumstances thrust 'Rotkiv' into a leadership role at a very young age. While his youth brought energy and innovation to their operations, it also introduced elements of instability.

The challenges of leadership in such a high-stakes environment were compounded by the temptations and distractions that came with the resistance lifestyle, including the allure of money and the risks of romantic entanglements.

Despite these challenges, the Verhaeghe family's resolve did not waver.

Their operations continued with the same fervor, albeit under the shadow of increased danger. Each crossing of the Leie was meticulously planned, always involving the three layers of protection: the guise of a family visit, the fallback of smuggling contraband, and the ultimate resort to physical confrontation if necessary.

The episode on the Leie bridge highlights the perilous nature of resistance work and the extraordinary lengths to which ordinary citizens went to oppose the tyranny of occupation.

The resistance network in Brussels was notably facilitated by Mr. Plasse and the Verhaeghe family, particularly Clotilde Maria Verhaeghe and her daughter, Marie Louise Plasse in Brussels. In the war's final two years, the home in Deerlijk became a hub for resistance activities. Individuals from Brussels frequently arrived by train to Deerlijk, opting for this small village over the more conspicuous city of Kortrijk to avoid suspicion. These visitors often spent the night with the Verhaeghe family before heading to Kortrijk during the day to conduct resistance-related activities.

The Verhaeghe family's links to France were primarily maintained through Seraphin René Verhaeghe and Rachelle Demeyere. Ostensibly, their visits to France were made for family reasons. This guise effectively masked their purpose of coordinating with French resistance members and facilitating cross-border communication and operations.

The family's connections extended to England through Rachelle Verhaeghe, daughter of Medard Verhaeghe, and her husband, Mr. A. Strickland. This connection was pivotal, providing a direct line to London's British intelligence and support networks. Through these connections, the Verhaeghe family contributed to the coordination and execution of various resistance operations, including intelligence gathering and the facilitation of escape routes for Allied soldiers and other individuals targeted by the Nazis.

By using their strategic connections in Brussels, France, and England, the Verhaeghes effectively supported the broader resistance efforts.

The Verhaeghe family's activities can be better understood within the broader framework of the Belgian resistance, which included various networks such as the White Brigade, the Comet Line, and the Armée Secrète. These groups, often operating independently but with common goals, engaged in sabotage, intelligence gathering, and creating escape routes for Allied soldiers. The Verhaeghe family's contributions were part of this giant mosaic of resistance, characterized by its diversity of methods and participants.

The exact date when André Verhaeghe, son of Julien Verhaeghe, began his involvement in resistance activities remains unknown. As depicted in Figure 48.178 on page 952, he officially joined the White Brigade of the Resistance in the spring of 1944. He remained an active member until Deerlijk was liberated in September 1944. Deerlijk fell under the jurisdiction of the Waregem sector, facilitating André Verhaeghe's recruitment through this branch.

The Verhaeghe family possessed British binoculars, although one lens was shattered, and the copper casing was heavily dented. It was rumored that a British airman, whose plane had been downed during WWII, had gifted these binoculars to the family.

On September 7, 1944, a family member took refuge at a house at the intersection of Kapel-ter-Rustestraat and Stationsstraat near Cassinastraat. This junction is illustrated in Figure 48.199 on page 968. The family member, 'Rotkiv,' was monitoring the situation, possibly under directives from contacts in Zwevegem.

That morning, a British armored vehicle, commanded by Trooper Thomas Marshall of the Recce, 15th Scottish Division, arrived from Zwevegem along Stationsstraat. The vehicle parked a short distance from Cassinastraat on the left side of the road, soon followed by additional cars. Another vehicle parked across the road, and soldiers positioned a six-pounder cannon in front of the socialist headquarters ('t Belfort), aiming at the two junctions. Members of the White Brigade also arrived to support the British forces.

As the situation remained calm, curious onlookers began to gather. The Derlike article lists citizens present, including Frans Deknudt, Norbert Decraene, Ferdinand Gardyn, Jules T' Joen, Staf Benoit, André Vannieuwenhuyze, Georges Deconinck, Jean Matthys, and Paul Benoit.

Suddenly, the British troops spotted German forces moving along Harelbekestraat at its junction with Stationsstraat and opened fire. The Germans quickly set up an 88 mm anti-tank cannon behind a corner and aimed it down Stationsstraat at the British forces. Thomas Marshall swiftly moved his vehicle to the other side of the road and entered Kapel-ter-Rustestraat. The Germans fired on the vehicles that had parked behind Marshall's position.

The British positioned their cannon at the intersection of Stationsstraat and Kapel-ter-Rustestraat and targeted a German tank on Hoogstraat, at its junction with Stationsstraat.

Unfortunately, they mistakenly hit a British vehicle that had entered Deerlijk from another road. This error resulted in the deaths of British soldiers A.A.D. Davies and B.T. Miggins, with one soldier managing to escape.

Subsequently, the British received orders to retreat to the Deerlijk train station towards Zwevegem. They hurried back along Stationsstraat, zig-zagging to avoid German fire from the 88 mm cannon.

Several British vehicles parked at the junction were hit. One such explosion injured 'Rotkiv' and his friend. Despite the common belief that the vehicle had been struck by German fire, the wounded family member always maintained that British forces had caused the damage. Thomas Marshall's witness account, transcribed in the 1980s or 1990s and published in Derlike, corroborates this story.

The family member sustained a hand injury from the explosion, with a metal shard embedded in his hand until its surgical removal around 1984.

According to Jan Deloof's work,[41] German soldiers continued hiding in a small forest near the Gaverbeek creek between Deerlijk center and Zwevegem after the initial Deerlijk skirmish. Someone spotted the Germans and informed the British.

[41] Jan Deloof, "Onze Oorlog - Zwevegem om de Tweede Wereldoorlog" (2009)

This led to a British bombing of the forest. The British forces were positioned near the entrance of the Versschuere farm on Blokkestraat in Zwevegem.

During the final days of the war, an abundance of horse meat was consumed in Deerlijk, as the retreating Germans left behind many dead and injured horses. One family member even rode a horse home from Hoogstraat, where it was subsequently killed indoors. The ground trembled from the horse's fall, prompting neighbors to inquire about the event, which became a long-standing family anecdote.

Another wartime episode involved a wedding in Deerlijk on the day of the German retreat. Despite the surrounding danger, the ceremony took place in the church, followed by a reception at the Socialist headquarters at the junction of Stationsstraat and Kapel-ter-Rustestraat. The couple spent their wedding night hiding in the building's basement amidst ongoing shootings and explosions. In an interview published in Derlike, the bride humorously noted that no wedding had experienced as much "shooting" as theirs, referencing the traditional fireworks known as 'shooting at the wedding.'

It is crucial to distinguish between two individuals named André Verhaeghe. One, born in Kortrijk on January 9, 1914, was a notable resistance fighter from Kortrijk, possibly a distant relative of André Verhaeghe from Deerlijk. However, not part of the Atheneum fighters, the Kortrijk Verhaeghe was connected to them and linked to resistance activities near the Koninklijk Atheneum in Kortrijk. This connection suggests a possible involvement of the Verhaeghe family and the broader Verhaeghe Network through Medard Verhaeghe.

48.10.5 The WWII Resistance of the Last Semester

Although, as we have explained above, resistance networks existed from the beginning of the war, the official White Brigade of Deerlijk was deployed only in the last semester at Deerlijk. By only highlighting the existing records of this period at Deerlijk, an article in Derlike[42] scrutinizes and denigrates the resistance as if it were a joke.

This is, however, not entirely fair.

Resistance networks had been operational throughout the war at Deerlijk, including members of the extended Verhaeghe family. Still, the military and structured White Brigade at Deerlijk was established only when the Belgians anticipated the invasion by the Allies.

A group of people was necessary to preserve law and order during a vacuum after the Germans had been driven out and before an occupational force [43] would have arrived.

The White Brigade of Deerlijk, which has existed only briefly, has undertaken only one act of sabotage. Just after the Germans were driven out, they were equipped with beautiful white uniforms, which appears to be too much of an honor if we remember that they had almost nothing on the list of their achievements. However, such a uniform was not given as a reward. Still, it was necessary to expose the fact that they were there to preserve order when the Germans were gone and represent the Belgian government after the arrival of the British. Nobody would have gained in a jungle except robbers. Their job at that time was that of policemen. They had to protect the people from the people, and they also had to ensure no looting.

It is true that after the war, this group received more accolades than they deserved as if they had liberated the country. Nevertheless, their presence had been significant. Nobody could have anticipated in the summer of 1944 how necessary they might have been should anything have gone wrong during or just after the retreat of the Germans. The person who had been a member of this official brigade for the longest time at Deerlijk and who had never hidden such involvement was André Verhaeghe, son of Julien.

We know two essential endeavors in his role as the White Brigade soldier.

First, he cut a telephone wire that connected Kortrijk to Brussels. It occurred on the night of 6-7 July 1944 and was commanded by Commander Windels from Waregem. It was André Verhaeghe who climbed the post and cut the wires. He was an officer then, under Florent Deloof, who had received the order from Windels. Although this act may seem unimportant because the Germans repaired the cable the next day, it was risky. It occurred at a crucial and coordinated time, significantly disrupting the Germans.

The second act was when the Germans were still in Deerlijk and had prepared to defend the village against the British while the British were approaching from Zwevegem to inform the British. Thanks to his family connections in Stationsstraat and near the train station, André could easily approach the railway. Then he crossed it and reached a farm in Deerlijk, the nearest to Zwevegem. He communicated with the British, who were positioned at the canal Leie-Schelde. Thanks to his information, the Germans would not ambush the British.

Indeed, instead of penetrating the village through Stationsstraat, they approached the town along three roads. The first approach occurred from Vichte to Belgiek and then to the downtown area; the other course from Zwevegem, which the Germans expected the most, would be taken last. Meanwhile, outstanding coordination would allow the troops at Zwevegem to protect the flanks approaching from Vichte.

This is why the White Brigade requested resistance groups and individuals to occupy, as civilians, specific observation posts near essential junctions in the village. Communication occurred by running through the fields. The west of Stationsstraat was just farmland (also known as de Gavers), with some bushes and creeks. Therefore, observers who were good runners could easily cross the fields to transfer information. It allowed the British at Zwevegem to know what to aim at with their heavy artillery and when to assault.

Above, we have described the events at the junction of Stationsstraat with Kapel-ter-Rustestraat and Cassinastraat. It's essential to reread the events while keeping the provided information in mind.

Regarding resistance, we should not be guided by romantic books about heroes or action movies. Numerous self-declared heroes may or may not have taken action at the war's end, later, or even in their dreams.

The Verhaeghe network was not a romantic gang of heroes but of young and energetic entrepreneurs who did not fit into a world of nazism. The network ended up in underground activities, which included smuggling and feeding the poor and the hungry. Assisting or undertaking work for the military resistance also happened, but it has never been their sole purpose. They have never actually considered themselves as members of a secret militia.

Favors were paid with blessings: information, sometimes food, sometimes assisting a passage, or perhaps an act of sabotage. Sabotage was dangerous but was not as spectacular as in movies. Cutting communication wires was a typical sabotage activity, not the big explosions as in the film.

The Verhaeghes were also not the kind of people who would murder or deliberately endanger others.

We should also note that the organized secret army existed only from August 1943 onward. Before that, the resistance was merely a large number of networks that operated more or less like the Verhaeghe network and mixed several types of underground activities, some of a military nature, but most to resist the situation, smuggle, and provide families with food.

[42] Derlike XLII, 1 (2019)

[43] the Britains, or the Americans or the Polish.

Feeding one's family was also an act of resistance because otherwise, one had to live on ration coupons or work for the Germans.

Actual sabotage, for instance, mainly occurred from the summer of 1943 onward, when the Allied forces were steadily making plans to invade Nazi-held Europe.

There were also acts of sabotage to protect constructions from planned destruction by the Germans upon their withdrawal. Even here, cutting wires or providing information was the most critical activity.

People from Harelbeke, for instance, had prepared to loot textile factories in Deerlijk, but the white brigade, as they were called, stopped them by force. We can refer to Armand Deknudt in his series de Septemberdagen van 1944 in Derlike in 1997.

There, we can read that on September 5, 1944, the Germans had left Deerlijk, but then, suddenly, other Germans with tanks arrived, and Deerlijk was once again occupied. The secret army had already secured the village but had to go underground again.

On September 6, the Germans were in Deerlijk, while the British were in Zwevegem. It was André Verhaeghe who was able to reach Deerlijk's station area. We described above how this was made possible. André Verhaeghe hid in a farm near the train station and communicated with the British at the canal in Zwevegem. They said they would invade Deerlijk but first strike with artillery to drive the Germans out. André said the Germans expected this and better invade Deerlijk from the other side.

The organized secret army of the White Brigade in Deerlijk was established on March 15, 1944, and belonged to Zone III of the Waregem Sector. This is the one that is documented and of which name lists exist.

Becoming a member may have been attractive because the end was near, there were rumors of an impending invasion by the Allies, and it was also a way to climb the stairs of (post-war) society.

André Verhaeghe was 22 at that time, his brother Maurice was 20. They had a callous youth because of the loss of their father and decided to join the secret army, first André and, much later, Maurice. It meant that the Verhaeghe network now also had an official military branch.

Interestingly, the White Brigade of Deerlijk had only 19 members, and their official outfit, worn after the Germans had left, can be seen in Figure 48.168. Ten joined on March 15, 1944, and four joined on June 1. Five joined on September 3, just a few days before the liberation of Deerlijk.

The data, published in Deerlike[44], show that André Verhaeghe joined on March 15, while his brother Maurice joined on September 3. André Verhaeghe cut communication wires on the night of 6-7 July 1944.

48.10.6 André Verhaeghe Before and After WWII

The reader may first want to check the funeral picture in Chapter 69.11.1.6.

We shall begin this section with a long citation describing André as he was. It is a translation of a text written by Robert Vanheerweghe.

A word from a friend - a hat with many feathers[45].

During his inauguration on Sunday, September 8, 2019, organized by the local NSB department Deerlijk in collaboration with the city council, André Verhaeghe was decorated for his merits as a resistance fighter. A detailed description of his activities during the war reaches beyond my capacities because I was born only in 1942. However, I can appeal to the many stories and anecdotes told to me by his good friend, Albert Vanhoenacker.

As with most stories, sometimes facts are forgotten, and others exaggerated. Yet, frequently recurring words were courage, fighting spirit, weighing the risk, conscientiousness, pride, and loyalty to the Fatherland. After WWII, André wanted to propagate those values through his political commitment. He became the secretary of the local branch of the Socialist Party. In that capacity, I experienced him the most. As a board member of the youth association, I became a member of the party management and participated in many exciting meetings.

There, I got to know and appreciate André's democratic attitude and organizational talent. With the help of only a few board members, he organized an unforgettable Oosthoek demonstration on April 26, 1964.

To give more charisma to our Socialist movement, he invited all comrades from the region to come and demonstrate in Deerlijk on that day. There was an enormous number of people. Endless processions of red flags and music bands drew prominent politicians on his guidelines through our beautiful congregation to end at the church. The audience was addressed from a podium by August Debunne, BSP representative of the people from Menen, among others. André became a municipal councilor, but as the only opposition member, he competed against ten CVP members who advocated a subordinate policy. André chose to submit all points of the plan to his entire administration.

After weighing up the many arguments, he defended our shared position in the municipal council with stubborn and enormous dedication. Sincerely straightforward, sometimes with a hint of aggression, he repeatedly succeeded in impressing through his used arguments, respectable language, and healthy fanaticism. He has been a real example! Has he had enemies because of that? Perhaps, but he was always concerned with the statements, not the persons. The inhabitants of Deerlijk respect him because of his proud attitude and neat clothing.

He is often approached with a question, a request, or a fact, but not as Dree or Dretie. He is always respectful as André, nevertheless not as Mr. André, because he is far too modest for that. Another example of André's versatility and enormously commendable personality is his driving force in establishing the Rijksbasisschool, 'De Driesprong,' in Deerlijk. He did this probably partly because of the 'School Struggle' that divided our country in 1955. Our municipality had two primary schools: the municipal school, exclusively for boys, and a free primary school for toddlers and girls.

André was annoyed by the pedagogical project, which was perhaps too religious, and the segregation of boys and girls.

He sometimes asked himself whether the local teachers of that municipal school, who were mainly indebted to the CVP board, were impartial in their teaching.

Perhaps they were not, though. Being very stubborn, he sought allies and got his grip on a file, resulting in a primary school with a nursery section. That is mainly his Merit: a primary school that has grown into a natural green pedagogical oasis. It's a pearl in Deerlijk's crown.

At one of the numerous meetings in our congress room at 'De Kroon,' the usefulness of literature was mentioned. André, a frequent reader, picked up on this and consulted the board about their reading habits. It turned out that there was a need to enable reading more books.

[45] Translated quote of Robert Vanheerweghe as an introduction to the book by Marc Vanwijnsberghe, 'André Verhaeghe, een man van Deerlijk' , self-published in 2020.

> Some board members bought books, which were quite expensive, lent them, and sometimes never received them back. Other board members nevertheless ventured to go to the so-called 'patronage' church library but were annoyed by the biased collection they had to offer. A board member indicated that he once wanted to read Lode Zielens 'Moeder waarom leven wij?,' but such a book was taboo in the 'patronage.' That is why André suggested starting up a library himself. In 'De Kroon,' there was still one room available. He appealed to all members to donate books. That was the start of a library 'Ontvoogding.' The name was appropriate, and the late Marcel Demeyere was the ideal librarian. His fascination with establishing a school and a library indicates his concern for the youth.
> Nevertheless, he also felt that older people needed communal activities. So, he started a retirement association as well. He was extraordinarily creditable and very versatile! André indeed deserves a hat with many feathers! But he was also, perhaps in the first place, a purebred resistance fighter at the service of our Fatherland!

The figure of André Verhaeghe has already been addressed in the previous sections, where he is also shown in his White Brigade uniform.

Here, we focus on other aspects of his youth and his mission after the war.

André Verhaeghe was the eldest son of Julien Florimond Verhaeghe and grandson of Jules Verhaeghe. The latter was the brother of Theophile Verhaeghe. Therefore, André's father was Zozyma Verhaeghe's cousin, and they were very close.

Julien Florimond Verhaeghe, whose military registration is given in Figure 48.169, born in Harelbeke on March 30, 1895, was a construction entrepreneur who died with his worker Julien Ferdinand Vanpanteghem in Spiere on August 4, 1932.

The event used to be remembered at Deerlijk as one of the significant tragedies of its recent past. The accident happened during the construction of a building along the Schelde River. Bricks and cement were transported across the river to reach the construction spot. The two were on the boat when a water current suddenly grabbed it. When they approached a waterfall, the two saw no other option but to jump off the ship and swim to the shore. However, the currents were too firm, and they both drowned. Julien had one brother and sisters.

At the funeral, there was a large delegation of Verbond der Vlaamse Oud-Strijders, VOS, Bond van Vlaamse Oud-soldaten, BVOS and Zivilarbeiter Bataillon, ZAB, to honor Julien Verhaeghe who had been a soldier in WWI and had been captured by the Germans. Indeed, he had ended up as a prisoner of war and forced labor.

Julien Verhaeghe was survived by his wife, Maria Vercruysse, and five children. The eldest child was André Verhaeghe, ten years old. The youngest was merely six months old. Sad memorabilia are shown in Figures 48.170, 48.171, 48.172 and 48.173.

The accident in Spiere was also described recently by Jan Vanoverberghe,[46] who performed research in the context of preservation as a monument of the grave of Julien Verhaeghe.

The pictures in Figures 48.174 were taken at a memorial service held in Spiere in 1936 when a plaque was fixed on the bridge where they died.

Incidentally, we noticed that Alfred Den Dauw, described in Chapter 67.9, was also present at the event, as seen in Figure 48.173.

We can describe André Verhaeghe in a few sentences. He is a very respectable and respectful man. He is too often associated with his life during the war because of his membership in the white brigade at the end. We can say without doubt that André had good intentions and that, had he been able to fabricate his own life, he would have performed dangerous missions with courage and idealism. Probably to his regret, the situation was less romantic and less heroic than in his dreams. Circumstances limited his importance at the end of the war.

However, being a member of the organization has been more critical for his career than the facts of the deeds he realized. We can make these statements because they are reality. They are not intended to diminish the person. André would remain a great man, even if he were not a hero at the war's end.

Interestingly, while this text was realized, another work appeared on the life of André Verhaeghe by Marc Vanwijnsberghe.[47] Warm words precede the manuscript by Robert Vanheerweghe, cited and translated above, who we may describe as an intellectual from Deerlijk who can share words of wisdom with a humorist flavor. Robert Vanheerweghe knows André Verhaeghe personally and in the context of the socialist party in Deerlijk and education. Indeed, Robert has been a teacher and school director, and André has been one of the prominent pioneers and supporters of the public school of Deerlijk. The way Robert describes André is adequate and very positive. His words clearly show that André is a great man, and his adventures during the war do not matter.

The book describes André Verhaeghe's life and highlights his contributions to the White Brigade. It's denigrating for André that this episode ever happened.

On the one hand, his membership propelled his career after the war. On the other hand, it has always required him to play a role that was not his. He had to play the war hero, which he was not. That's unfortunate.

If the episode had never happened, then André, given his qualities, would likely have had a similar career, but people would have judged him for who he was, not for the romantic war hero he was supposed to be.

Marc Vanwijnsberghe's manuscript cites an interview with André. It's painful to read how vague his answers are and how few precise facts he can mention about the war apart from 'we were idealists' and 'I was not there' and 'I have not seen it.' Luckily, the book highlights the rest of his life, during which the man flourished like a horse rider.

We can safely say that after having been a member of the white brigade, the end of the war was the beginning of the political career of André Verhaeghe.

He voluntarily reinforced his situation by joining the Belgian army after the liberation of Deerlijk and became involved in the Battle of the Bulge in the winter of 1944-1945. Later, he participated in the occupation of Germany. He remained in the military, became the first sergeant, and quit voluntarily on August 20, 1946.

Having had good connections with the communists, socialists, and others within the White Brigade and having had a challenging youth after losing his dear father, defending people experiencing poverty had become the primary purpose in his life.

We should not forget that André, the eldest of the family, did not attend school after his father's death but instead had to work very hard to add extra income to the family budget to stay alive and feed his siblings. His mother, Maria Vercruysse, was called 'the courageous widow' and was a shop owner. Having struggled so hard strengthened André, which is why he dared to join the white brigade at the end of the war and wanted to fight for people with low incomes after the war. The man is an honorable person. Some indications of his life after WWII are shown in Figure 48.168.

The public primary school of Deerlijk has existed since 1963. The founder was André Verhaeghe, who initiated political talks to receive support for his idea, which was just a dream at the beginning. But, in 1962, MP Jules Deconinck from Wevelgem, a socialist, approached the local party members André Verhaeghe, Georges Verschae, and Robert Vanheerweghe and informed them that the government was willing to support the establishment of a new public school. Interestingly, Georges Verschae was friends with Gerard Vangheluwe, Zozyma Verhaeghe, Adolf Dequesne, and Elsa Serleth. Hence, the tandem between Georges Verschae and André Verhaeghe was strongly entangled with the Verhaeghe family, not only through André but also through a much older understanding.

Gerard Vangheluwe and Zozyma Verhaeghe were pioneers in providing education for their children in Kortrijk and later in Waregem when most people would never leave their tiny village. We know for sure, however, that the couple was Christian, definitely not atheistic. Zozyma even had her private chair in church.

The fact is that the Verhaeghe family loved the idea of free-thinking, even though they were Catholic. Questioning one's religion is a way to achieve a more profound belief.

Then, Minister of National Education Victor Larock established the De Rijkslagere school (RLS) on January 16, 1963.

In reality, the construction of the school still had to begin from scratch. André Verhaeghe and Georges Verschae found themselves in an almost impossible situation. Indeed, there were no buildings or pupils for the implantation of another school network in the village of Deerlijk.

The endeavor was an almost inconceivable task because there was probably no need for this type of school in Deerlijk.

Indeed, Deerlijk had had a long tradition of very decent education, which a lot of liberalism had already penetrated. Numerous people did not understand why such a school of free-thinkers, liberals, and socialists needed to embed the village. The opposition against the new school was firm and would remain vital for many years.

The author even witnessed stigmatization and bullying in the 1980s.[48]

There was also a lot of gossip. People said that the public school children were not decent, not brilliant, atheists, and much more. However, such stigmatization motivated the teachers even more, while competition must have sharpened the teachers of the other schools. Competition sometimes has positive results.

Nowadays, the school is more widely accepted in Deerlijk, and there is much better mutual understanding and friendship.

The author entered the public school of Deerlijk when he was less than two and a half years old and went to school until he was eleven and a half. Not every teacher was perfect, but he can assure the reader that most teachers were among the best imaginable. The experience of denigration at Deerlijk was, in fact, very motivating. What does not kill you makes you stronger.

The author took the catholic religion from age six until 16 and was not an atheist. He had, however, many atheist teachers, but different views and opinions can be very enriching. From eleven and a half until seventeen, the author went to public middle and high school (Koninklijk Atheneum) in Waregem. Stigmatisation also existed at Waregem. The school was called 'Kiekenschool' by outsiders. The author studied Latin, Maths, and Sciences there and decided to study at the Catholic University of Leuven. He has never experienced a lack of education. When he wanted to enter the university, the administration told him they first had to investigate whether his school met all requirements.

Prejudice was indeed prevalent everywhere. After he had become a Master in Physics cum laude, the author wanted to do a PhD with a retired professor at the Catholic University, but an emeritus professor had no funding at that time; therefore, he switched to the University of Ghent, which was, in fact, the University version of the public schools he had frequented as a child. In Ghent, there was again prejudice because someone from a Catholic University was like a stranger to them. So, he did a PhD at Ghent and became a Doctor of Philosophy in Engineering Physics summa cum laude. After his PhD, the author was supposed to enter a world many describe as asinus asinum fricat.

However, he had different plans and became a professor in the United States of America at 30, a University always in the top 5 engineering schools in the country.

At Georgia Tech, he climbed the echelons to the highest rank and never experienced any drawbacks caused by his early educational years.

Looking back, the author is happy that science, education, and knowledge mattered more than where he went to school. He learned a lot from numerous points of view, controversies, and different political schools of thought. After all, an excellent religious man is not necessarily better or worse than a good atheist. Goodness reveals itself in actions, not so much in words or hypocrisy.

So, return to the establishment of the new public school in Deerlijk in 1963. The site was met with a lot of skepticism at Deerlijk. The existing schools were not pluralistic. Almost all teachers in the schools in Deerlijk lived locally, took part in the social, cultural, and sporting life, had a reputation, and enjoyed the parents' confidence. A public school in Deerlijk, like Hugo Defraeye, wrote, 'seemed like a bogeyman in fairyland.'

And yet, the two pioneers persisted. They founded a Club (called Vriendenkring) on March 24, 1963. This Club would be the driving force behind the construction and development of the school. In addition to Verhaeghe and Verschae, the members were Ms Raïs Picavet, Marcel Demeyer, Willy Derudder, Julien D' Hulst, Walter Heugens, Julien and Norbert Lorrez and Roger Coussement, the first principal of the school, and Robert Vanheerweghe. Figure 48.175 shows the founders of the school established by André Verhaeghe.

A suitable terrain was found on the Dries (next to Kapel-ter-Ruste). The land belonging to farmer Remi Devos was confiscated, which angered Deerlijk. However, Remi Devos quickly changed his opinion and became a close ally of the school.

In no time, four pavilions rose from the ground. Indeed, the situation was urgent because the Club wanted to begin classes on September 1. Unfortunately for the other schools, several children would switch schools. However, failure was not an option. The Club visited numerous families in Deerlijk, trying to convince them to have their children attend public school. It is said that one in thirty visits was successful. The message was always that the school represented pluralism. Children of any ideology could live and study together and cross-fertilize their brains with mutual respect for other people's opinions.

Memorabilia during the author's life are shown in Figures 48.176 and 48.177. The school is preparing yet another revolution under director Isabelle Christiaens and will be provided with modern infrastructure.

By the end of August, 60 pupils in the primary school were subscribed and another 36 in the nursery school. The teaching staff were all very motivated persons who were unknown in Deerlijk. Therefore, they could not rely on their circle of friends to attract children and had to work extra hard and use their enthusiasm to convince more parents to send their children to public school. The first teachers were Roger Coussement (the director), Mrs. Lucrèce Dammekens, Norbert Duquesnoy, Miss Marie-Paule Mattelaer, and Jacqueline Hoste. Many more would follow in their footsteps, some of whom the author still regards as crucial persons in the course of his development, such as Mrs. Marie-Jeanne (family of Mr. Delrue, husband of Renilde Verhaeghe, described in Chapter 48.9.4), [48] Examples included but were not limited to falsification of swim contests (1985, the author won by 1.5 m but was registered second, behind someone from gemeentelijke jongensschool) at the public swimming pool, less access to sports facilities at Gaverdomein, the organization of competition for the giant pumpkin of the village while distributing a small variety (orange) to the public school and a massive variety (white) to the other schools, to name a few.

Mrs. Chantal Delbarge, Mrs Nadine Detremmerie, and Mrs Mady Vandendriessche. Indeed, children addressed their teachers by their first names in public schools in the 1980s. The most inspiring director in the 1980s was Freddy François (husband of Erna Verhaeghe). The best school guardian was Mrs Greta (Georges Verhaeghe's wife and André Verhaeghe's sister-in-law). In the fifth grade, at the age of 10, the author gave a 30-minute presentation about the solar system. He received 20/10 for his work, i.e., ten surplus points. The teacher (Mrs. Nadine) must have sensed that perhaps an astrophysicist was born. In 2000, the author indeed because a Master's in Astrophysics cum laude. In 1963, the school had no road, playground, water, or electricity, and cows grazed up to the classroom windows.

The school bus was initially a Volkswagen bus of Gerard Bert from Harelbeke. Then, school equipment arrived, and in January 1964, the playgrounds were there, the meadows were covered, and the refectory with a kitchen was furnished. The service personnel expanded, and gradually, the pioneering days evolved into a period of regular school life.

On September 1, 1969, Alfons Crabbé succeeded director Coussement, and the school had 104 students. Mr Leon Bettens became chairman of the Club Vriendenkring, and both were to start an intense campaign: Deerlijk was allowed to pick up students in Vichte, where many more possible attendees lived. By 1975, when the author was born, 324 children were attending public school. The vast number required eight classes of primary education and five kindergarten classes. The school also has new and comfortable buildings: airy classrooms, a modern media library, a play area, and a modern kitchen. In the meantime, school buses were indispensable in the region: after Bert, the first female driver, Monique (Monika) Vanhevel made a name for herself with the blue Tempo, the first private bus purchased by the Club. Then came the orange Leyland and the blue Mercedes with Lucien Gevaert as the driver.

In the beginning, the teaching staff changed almost every year, but over time, a stabilization occurred, and many more teachers settled in Deerlijk. They propagated the objectives of the primary school: respect for other people's convictions in an atmosphere of tolerance.

Like every other school, the school has gone through ups and downs. In particular, around 2000, the school was in deep trouble due to a lack of children. That's when the author decided to support the school by enrolling his children. Indeed, the family lived in Deerlijk back then. Later, the children went to a French school to become bilingual. It was also around 2000 that Clodien Verschae, daughter of Georges Verschae, together with Carinne Dhaene, Gino Baert, Jozef Gevaert, Andy Demeulemeester and several others of the Club, including, as a minor player, the author, and also the director at that time, Ilse Delombaerde, did the best they could to regain momentum by re-establishing the school's strong reputation.

The current director, Isabelle Christiaens, flawlessly continues this terrific task. The school is flourishing again, just like the other outstanding schools of Deerlijk, and will be modernized in the coming years. The author's wife, Shirani de Silva, has had a warm bond with all the children of the school for over two decades. Hopefully, they will remember her just like the author still remembers every staff member from 40 years ago.

Still today, it's safe to state that Deerlijk belongs to exemplary villages in terms of education.

The pioneering blood of the Verhaeghes probably emerged when the author became a tenured professor of Georgia Tech Atlanta to settle at GT-Lorraine in Metz, France, when the first laboratories were established there and they first offered a complete academic program.

At the same time, he has always remained an inhabitant of Deerlijk and, later, Kortrijk.

She was a haute couture tailor who specialized in wedding dresses.

She was a sister of Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe (Harelbeke February 15, 1892), described in Chapter 48.9.5.4, who was killed as a soldier during WWI on September 28, 1918, on the battlefield of Langemark-Houthulst. His body has never been found.

She is also the author's great-grandmother and is equally referred to in Chapter 69.

She was born in Harelbeke on September 5, 1898, in Figure 48.183, and died in Kortrijk on July 9, 1981, in Figure 48.184, in the

The last owners were Secember-Christiaens. This family moved to Harelbeke on October 14, 1920. The home was then bought by Gerard Vangheluwe and Zozyma Verhaeghe, who married on July 20, 1921 and was used only for residential purposes. They had their first two children born there, namely Marie Louise and René. They lived there until a few years after 1925. Courtesy of Archive Leon Defraeye Deerlijk, item 10.192. Figure 48.189: Left is a picture of Lucien Vangheluwe in 1938, taken on the wedding of René Verhaeghe (described in Chapter 48.9.5.1), by Lucien's elder brother René. Lucien died at the age of 5, on September 22, 1940, due to a (cow) smallpox vaccination, which killed him in 10 days. His death has been a shock for the family and a wound that never healed. The authorities have always denied the accusations. The family consistently reported that the nurse responsible for administering the smallpox vaccine did not adequately shake the vial prior to administration. This oversight may have resulted in a higher concentration of the vaccine being delivered to the child than intended, with lethal effects. The fact is that he was a perfectly healthy boy and very energetic until the day after his vaccination. When he was dying, he asked his brother to buy a bicycle with a real chain. On the picture with friends, we find her at the bottom left, with cap, and notice also Elizé Broucke (middle) and Irma Verhaeghe (right). Behind is Theophile Caby (right, with cap). We equally see her on another shot with her daughter-in-law Anna Den Dauw. One frame shows how Zozyma Verhaeghe just bought French Fries at a carnival at Deerlijk (Kerkplein) or Kortrijk. The woman to her right is Elsa Serleth (1907-1986), the wife of Adolf Dequesne, from Deerlijk. Adolf was a good friend of Georges Verschae, see also Chapter 48.10.5. A moment of sadness is presented in the photo where Zozyma Verhaeghe is seen with her granddaughter (and foster daughter) Nelly Maria Vangheluwe, mother of the author, in 1962 at the funeral of Zozyma's sister Irma Verhaeghe at Sint Lodewijk, Deerlijk. Finally, a moment of celebration is shared of the 50 years marriage anniversary of Gerard Vangheluwe and Zozyma Verhaeghe. (Declercq de Silva Archive) author's presence.

Her father was Theophile Verhaeghe, and her mother was Marie Louise De Vos.
Her husband was Gerard Vangheluwe.

She was born in Harelbeke, shown in Figure 48.185, and lived in the downtown area of Deerlijk, in Figure 48.186. A picture of her in that period is shown in Figure 48.187.
There is also a beautiful picture of Zozyma Verhaeghe, her fiancé, and her siblings and cousins in Deerlijk just after WWI, in Chapter 48.10.2.

48.11.1.3 The First World War

WWI facts have been described in the life of her brother Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe, such as in Chapter 48.9.5.4.5.

Her marriage and other events can be found in Chapter 69, on the Surmont family line of Gerard Vangheluwe, particularly in Chapter 69.9.

48.11.1.5 Life in Pictures and Key Facts

As with several persons in this book, the abundance of pictures allows for a more engaging narrative than a thousand words.
To provide a comprehensive understanding of Zozyma's life, we present Figures 48.186, 48.189, 48.190 and 48.191, each capturing a significant period or event in her life.

48.11.2 Gerard Vangheluwe

Gerard Vangheluwe is primarily described in Chapter 69 as the son of Marie Nathalie Surmont and François Vangheluwe and the author's great-grandfather.
Two of his children have played a crucial role in the author's life: the eldest son, René Vangheluwe, as the grandfather, and Pierre Vangheluwe, a foster father.
For the latter, we refer, just as for Gerard Vangheluwe, to Chapter 69 for extensive information.
Also, Jeanette Verbrugghe, who has served as a foster mother, is extensively described there. Her parents, Gerard Verbrugghe and Maria Van den Abeele, who have acted like foster grandparents, are extensively described in Chapter 77.

48.12 René Vangheluwe & Anna Den Dauw

48.12.1 René Vangheluwe

René Vangheluwe is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 67 as the husband of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 69 as the grandson of Maria Nathalie Surmont; and Chapter 72 as the husband of Anna Den Dauw.

48.12.1.1 Introduction

René Vangheluwe was born in Deerlijk in 1925 and he died in Izegem in 2017. He was married to Anna Den Dauw, who died in 1999 in Kortrijk.

Figure 48.194: The author has regularly been a plenary speaker at famous congresses organized by Academician Prof. Dr. Sergei Kulakov from the St Petersburg State University of Aerospace Instrumentation in Russia. Sometimes, the congress was held in the university infrastructure; other times, it took place on a cruise ship on the lakes North of the city. On the top right, the author was presented with an award by the Rector of the University, Prof. Dr A. Ovodenko, while Prof. Dr Sergei Kulakov was making the announcement. The congress secretary was Lyudmila Konovalova, who has always been extremely friendly and helpful with the organization and visa arrangements. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

48.12.1.2 His Personality

René Vangheluwe's educational journey, which began at the Royal Atheneum of Kortrijk, was abruptly interrupted by the onset of World War II in 1940. Despite this, he demonstrated remarkable resilience, leaving school in 1942 to immerse himself in various economic activities. This decision, a significant departure from his scholarly path, was a testament to his ability to adapt to the tumultuous times and the tragic loss of his younger brother to smallpox just after the German invasion of Belgium. This personal tragedy, though profoundly traumatic, did not break his spirit, but rather left a lasting impression on René.

René's intellectual prowess was evident, yet circumstances prevented him from fully realizing his potential. Despite this, he excelled in other areas, notably in sports and playing soccer until age 60. His remarkable speed and agility were assets on the field and during the war years.

René founded and managed several companies as an entrepreneur, earning admiration and respect from his extensive network. His employees often spoke highly of him, appreciating the opportunities he provided.

Known for his adventurous and sometimes reckless business approach, René was a paradoxical figure. He appeared open yet authoritarian, and his underlying insecurity often drove him to acts of generosity. During the war, he frequently sold food to needy families at low prices or on credit, which was seldom repaid. This generosity stemmed from a desire to be loved and admired, creating a network of indebtedness that offered him a sense of security.

One notable example of his compassion was his support for the Declercq-Lesage family, who lived on a farm near Deerlijk's train station during the war. His connection with this family extended beyond the war years, fostering a bond that influenced subsequent generations. René's wife, Anna Den Dauw, continued this legacy of kindness by cooking for the Declercq-Lesage children after the death of their mother, Irma Lesage. This intertwined history eventually led to the marriage of the author's parents in the 1960s.

Politically, René was a fervent believer in Communism, yet he lived a lifestyle reminiscent of American values, embodying a fascinating contradiction. He often engaged in lengthy discussions about the war, politics, and history, though his personal biases notably colored his narratives. A memorable aspect of his influence was his insistence that his grandson learn Russian, driven by his belief in the eventual global dominance of Communism—a prediction that history did not fulfill. Nevertheless, this linguistic endeavor proved valuable, facilitating the author's later academic and professional interactions with Russian scientists.

In 2004, the author embarked on a journey that exemplified bridging cultures and eras. Traveling from Gdansk to Saint Petersburg and then to Moscow on a Tupolev plane, he participated in scientific congresses and visited laboratories, strengthening his connections within the international scientific community. An anecdote from this period highlights the unexpected warmth and camaraderie he experienced: navigating the Moscow metro to visit Vitali Voloshinov's team at Moscow State University, he was initially denied entry by a guard. After a tense exchange, the guard relented, and the author successfully reached his destination, surprising his hosts with perseverance. When, at nine, Natalia Polikarpova arrived with Vitali B. Voloshinov (1947-2019), shown in Figure 48.192, and someone else, they were stunned that he was standing there and could not believe he had reached their door all alone. It is an anecdote that is still being told regularly. The picture in Figure 48.193 was taken that day. The anecdote of this

Then, in 1938, René Vangheluwe was spotted at the Canadian War monument of Vimy in France. The memorial is located at Givenchy-en-Gohelle, just south of Lens in France. The same year, he enjoyed his holidays at Verdain-le-Veille, just north of Lens in France, with the Demeyere family in the French resistance during WWI. The family is described in Chapter 48.9.5.1 (Leonie, Josephe, Germaine, and children). (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

The prestigious building used to be a military base of the 2nd line regiment of the Belgian army and had been used in 1916, during WWI, for the deportation of forced laborers by the Germans, described in Chapter 69.9.1.3. The place is also regarded as the headquarters of the resistance of Kortrijk during WWII.*

Figure 48.199: From right to left, several impressions are given of the WWII period. On the last Sunday of 1940, René Vangheluwe visited, with his friend Daniel Derudder, the Groeninghe statue in Kortrijk. Note that the Derudder family also founded a school in Deerlijk, described in Chapter 48.10.5. In 1942, we see René Vangheluwe with baker André Pattijn from Harelbeke. They were dressed in Zazou fashion, typical for occupied Europe, to protest against the Germans. In 1942, we observe René Vangheluwe in outfit during WWII operations. A photo of René Vangheluwe and Anna Den Dauw in 1944 is shown, when they were just married at the war's end. The Zazou fashion still influenced their style. We equally notice the junction of Stationsstraat and Kapel-Ter-Rustestraat in Deerlijk. There have been fierce fights here between the British and the Germans during the liberation of Deerlijk in 1944, described in Chapter 48.10.5. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

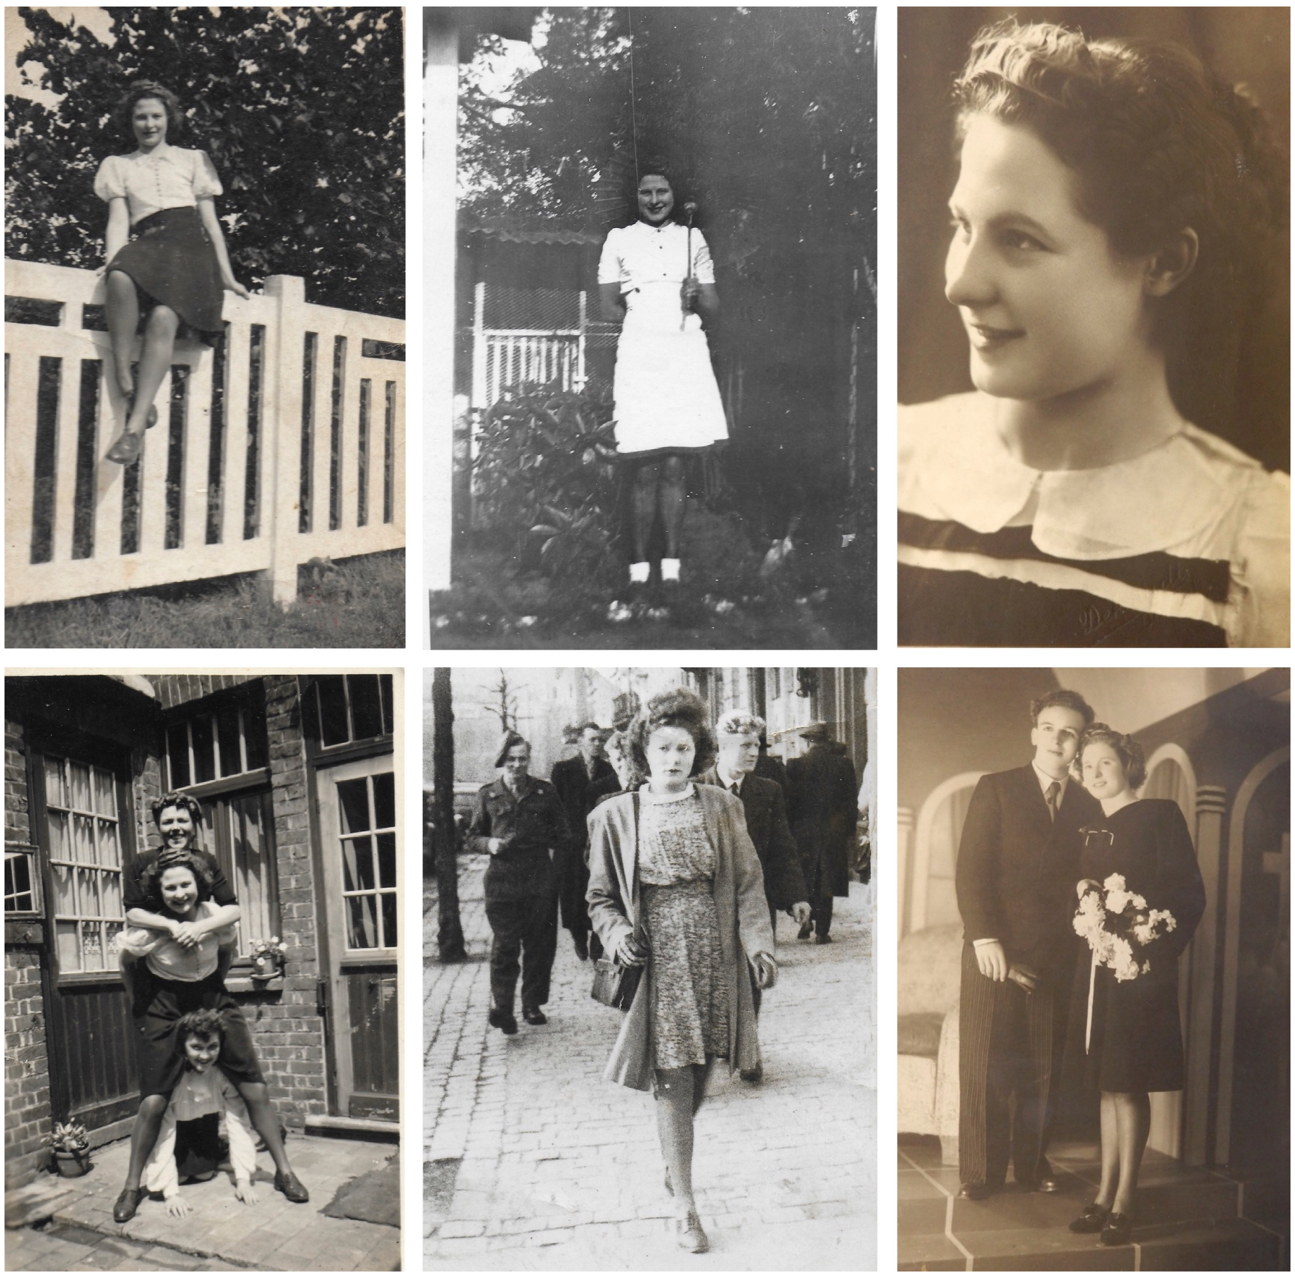

Figure 48.205: *In the upper row, we see Anna Den Dauw around 1944, in 1952, and the beginning of WWII. The lower row shows her in 1944 with two friends in Saint Louis, Deerlijk. The lower middle picture was taken in 1945-1947, likely in Kortrijk. Her hair and dress show signs of the Zazou fashion during WWII against the German occupation. In the background, there is an accidental soldier in the picture. Experts told the author that this soldier was British (RAC division, with copper signs on his shoulder) in 1945. Otherwise, it may have been a Belgian soldier from 1946 to 1947 who had a similar uniform with slightly different symbols on the shoulders. Indeed, the airforce base of Wevelgem was in British hands after the war until 1946, after which it was returned to the Belgian army. Comparison with other pictures and information indicates that the image was likely taken at the end of 1945. Finally, the lower right photo is her wedding with René Vangheluwe in 1944. visit is still frequently recounted, capturing the spirit of determination and cross-cultural engagement.

Acousto-Optics is the study of the interaction of light with sound. Briefly explained the sound causes a periodic modulation of the optical refractive index (through density variations caused by the acoustic pressure), deflecting light. Because of the periodicity and the weakness of the interaction, the light phase and not the amplitude are periodically distorted, which causes the sound wave to act like a diffraction grating. As a result, light is diffracted, which means it splits into different light rays, and the sound wave determines Doppler shifts. Engineers and scientists can use the principle to visualize and measure sound or control laser light. Therefore, as described in numerous scientific papers, it is essential in laser-guided systems, laser printing, optical communications systems, and many others. The author has regularly met with prominent

Pictures, more potent than words, are shown in Figures 48.195, 48.196, 48.197, 48.198, 48.199, 48.200, 48.201 and 48.202.

48.12.1.4 Some of his Acquaintances

René Vangheluwe had a vast network of friends and acquaintances, mainly in West-Flanders but also far beyond. He treated them very discreetly and hardly ever had mixed meetings. Some of his friends were ordinary men, and others were compelling.

His best friends were attorney Professor V. Wieme and his wife, Solange. They lived in Brussels, in Molenbeek Saint-Jean, in Boulevard Louis Mettewie. Mr Wieme was, at the end of his life, an honorary attorney. He died on June 20, 2015, at the age of 87. He has been, half a century, a member of the bar of lawyers in Ghent since 1960 and Brussels since 1963, and he was the successor, in Brussels, of attorney Pierard. Mr Wieme had a special relationship with Rwanda, where he managed the Antwerp Law Faculty program in Butare under challenging circumstances—the program aimed to train the necessary lawyers. Sadly, many of the students who graduated under his guidance perished in the genocide that ravaged the country shortly afterward. Mr Wieme also taught comparative law in Antwerp for many years.

René Vangheluwe's admiration for public figures was a notable aspect of his character. He held Albert Windels, the mayor of Deerlijk from 1961 until 1976, in high regard.

His appreciation extended to King Boudewijn of Belgium and Armand De Rore, a prominent figure from Waregem in Figure 48.203. He also had a close relationship with Eric Derycke's parents from Waregem, whom he knew well from WWII.

It is believed that many people were indebted to him, both financially and otherwise, which provided him with a sense of comfort and protection.

René Vangheluwe was a man deeply enmeshed in the intricate web of secrets spun during World War II and the years that followed. His knowledge of covert operations, personal indiscretions, and hidden agendas made him formidable. He guarded these secrets unyieldingly, understanding that the power they conferred was a double-edged sword. Those around him were acutely aware of the depth of his knowledge; some admired him for his discretion and wisdom, while others lived in constant apprehension of what he knew. This reverence and fear duality became the cornerstone of his influence. René's silent guardianship of such potent secrets cemented his unparalleled power and authority in a world where information was both currency and weapon.

48.12.2 Anna Den Dauw

48.12.2.1 Introduction

Being a Den Dauw, Anna is also listed in Chapter 67.

Furthermore, as she carries the same mtDNA as the author and is his grandmother, she also appears in the Chapter 72.

Anna Den Dauw loved traveling through France, Spain, and Portugal. In the late 1970s, the author traveled with his parents and grandparents through Iberia. Tourism hardly existed back then, and we could visit villages and people all over Spain in the early days after the Franco era. An impression is shown in Figure 48.204. We usually drove a powerful car with a caravan behind: our moving fortress through the Spanish landscape. The author can still smell and feel Spain in his distant memories. In particular, the taste of fresh Spanish Peaches and other fruits is still vividly alive in his warm memories of that time. The hot yellow soil in summer and the smell of conifers likewise.

Anna Den Dauw, born in Deerlijk (Saint Louis) on February 19, 1924, and passed away in Kortrijk on May 7, 1999, at the same hospital where, on October 21 that year, her great-grandson Benjamin Declercq would be born. The author cherishes the memory of sharing the news of his wife's pregnancy with Anna before her passing; her joy is palpable.

Despite her age, Anna had a unique gift of communication, especially with the younger generation. Her ability to connect with young people endeared her to teenagers, family, and neighbors. They saw in her a surrogate elder sister, always ready with wise and humanistic advice.

Anna often shared a fascinating aspect of her youth, a testament to her strong family ties and local history. Despite the early loss of her mother and her father's illness, her parents and grandparents had a close relationship with Flemish author Frank Lateur (Stijn Streuvels). Frank and his parents, who were bakers in Avelgem, were frequent visitors to the Den Dauw family in Otegem. Anna's paternal ancestors, renowned shoemakers, were a prominent part of the Otegem community. Their story is beautifully chronicled in Chapter 67.

Figure 48.208: Anna Den Dauw is depicted at the beach in Belgium or the North of France around 1954 and with her children Lucien and Nelly around 1957. The image in the church was taken at the wedding of Lucien and Jenny in 1968, and we can see Anna Den Dauw, Nelly Maria Vangheluwe, and Zozyma Verhaeghe, Anna's mother-in-law. Other images, such as Christmas Eve around 1960, at home in Oude Heerweg, Deerlijk, or 1962, in a Buick (production 1950-1959), are also shown. René had bought this car to travel comfortably to Venice with his family. Next, in 1966, we see Zozyma Verhaeghe, Anna Den Dauw, and Anna in her car. She liked driving cars until she was around 60 years old. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

In honor of Anna's deep love for photography and film, particularly those capturing her travels, family, and cherished moments from her youth, we will share her story primarily through the images she held so dear. These photos, reflecting the essence of her life and passions, speak more profoundly than words ever could.

48.12.2.3 Some of her Acquaintances

Frank Lateur, better known as Stijn Streuvels (Heule 1871 - Anzegem 1969), was a flemish writer, the son of a baker from Avelgem. He is shown in Figure 48.206. The Lateur bakers were well known by the Den Dauw family (Otegem). Declercq's grandmother, Anna Den Dauw, has seen Frank Lateur several times during her youth. The stories of Stijn Streuvels were viral and easy to read. Anna Den Dauw was equally acquainted with the families of Mekeirele, Mattijs, and many others through her uncles and grandparents.

Stijn Streuvels' life was deeply intertwined with the geographical landscape of the area on and North of the Schelde River, such as Avelgem, Otegem, etcetera. It was not uncommon for families from this region to move, for economic reasons, to the French border or just across the border. Indeed, in the 2nd half of the 19th century, we also found the Den Dauw family in that region, close to Roubaix, namely Leers-Nord. This geographical context, with its rich history and cultural diversity, undoubtedly played a significant role in shaping Streuvels' worldview and his literary works.

Franciscus Petrus Maria Lateur was born on October 3, 1871, in Heule, near Kortrijk. He died on August 15, 1969, at Ingooigem near Vichte. His parents were bakers. He ran their business between 1891 and 1895. He lived for around 20 years in his parents' bakery at Avelgem. His father was Camille Lateur (1844-1897), a baker and tailor; his mother was Louise Gezelle (1834-1909). Frank Lateur married Alida Staelens in 1905, in Avelgem. Their children were Paula, Paul, Dina, and Isa. Frank's siblings were Maria Louisa, Elisa, Camille, Karel and Maria. Frank's paternal ancestors were bakers from Avelgem, while his mother's family was from Heule. His grandparents at Avelgem were Pierre Lateur and Amelie Van Meenen. It was in Roubaix that Camille Lateur married Louise Gezelle in 1865. Frank Lateur is also described in Ernest Constant Declercq's life in Chapter 44.8.13.

48.12.2.4 Mother and Grandmother

Should we be able to ask Anna how she should be remembered in this book, her answer would be "show pictures!" Her will is fulfilled in Figures 48.207, 48.208, 48.209, and 48.204.

48.13 Nelly Maria Vangheluwe & Maurice Alois Declercq

48.13.1 Nelly Maria Vangheluwe

Nelly Maria Vangheluwe is described in Chapter 46 as the wife of Maurice Declercq (DC16). She is the author's mother, the daughter of René Vangheluwe and Anna Dendauw, born in 1945. They married in 1966. She is equally referred to in the following chapters:

Chapter 64 as the daughter-in-law of Irma Helena Lesage; Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2 as a great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67 as the daughter of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68 a an in-law 't Kint descendant; Chapter 69 as the great-granddaughter of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71 as great-granddaughter-in-law of Clemens Lammens; and Chapter 72 as the mother of the author.

48.13.2 Maurice Alois Declercq

He is described in Chapter 46 as the author's father and the son of Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq and Irma Helena Lesage. He was born in 1941 and died in 2015. He is equally described in the same chapters as Nelly Maria Vangheluwe.

48.14 Nico Felicien Declercq & Shirani Olupathage de Silva

Nico F. Declercq, the author of this book, is not only a figure in the Spanish paternal ancestry line in Chapter 47 but also in all the other chapters and bloodlines documented here.

Shirani de Silva appears in the same chapters as the author, with particular attention in Part XII with a separate description of her Iberian, Indian, and Sri Lankan ancestry.

In particular, she can also be found in the following chapters: Chapter 64 as granddaughter-in-law of Irma Helena Lesage; Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2 as a great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67 as granddaughter-in-law of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68; Chapter 69 as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71 as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Clemens Lammens; and Chapter 72 as the wife of the author.

Figure 49.1: Left is the Virgin of the Sierra, better known as 'la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc,' the patron of Montblanc, described in Chapter 49.6. Right is a close-up of Figure 49.8 on page 49.8, which is the oldest known image of the chapel in Deerlijk, described in Chapter 49.2 and representing the miracle that happened in that location in 1634. Striking is, for instance, the script in Jesus' hand in both pictures. It is also clear that Mary is standing in both depictions, while Jesus' and Mary's heads are approximately at the same height. In both cases, Jesus is not watching the spectator and is not looking down on him. The depiction of Figure 49.8 therefore shows that the 1634 miracle in Deerlijk, outlined in Chapter 49.5 and similar to the one of Montblanc, described in Chapter 49.6, occurred in front of a tree in which 'la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc' hung. The chapel, constructed near the wonder's location, would be called 'Kapel ter Ruste,' as described in Chapter 49.1. Anyone visiting Antwerp will see a Spanish Mary statue at the top of the facade of the town hall, placed there during the reign of Felipe II of Spain, which shows some similarities with the figure in Montblanc. Nevertheless, the Antwerp statue shows Jesus looking down on the spectators and holding the bible slightly differently. Also, the height of Jesus' head differs from that of Montblanc. Still, it is an additional indication that the Spanish who ruled Flanders around 1600 preferred this type of Mary with Jesus statuete.[1]

As described in Chapter 25.0.1.3, through generations, our family has acknowledged the profound significance of Church Retables, not solely as expressions of faith but also as embodiments of cultural heritage and artistic mastery. Retables, characterized by their intricate designs and spiritual narratives, function as focal points within sacred spaces, inviting contemplation and reverence. Understanding the immense dedication and resources required to craft such monumental works, our family has established a tradition of providing financial support. This commitment goes beyond mere philanthropy; it is a testament to our unwavering belief in the power of art to inspire, uplift, and unite communities. It is a commitment that we are proud to uphold.

Our investment in the creation of Church Retables is not just a tribute to our familial tradition, but a significant contribution to the preservation and enrichment of our collective cultural heritage. Through our patronage, we are empowering talented artists to perpetuate their craft and leave a legacy that transcends generations. This is a role we take with great responsibility and pride.

For instance, Notary Ramon Berenguer Desclergue supported Joan Barceló in creating a retable at Santa Maria del Pi in Barcelona, exemplifying our dedication to this endeavor.

Figure 49.2: Left is H.M. King Philip IV of Spain. The painting was made in 1644 by Diego Rodriguez de Silva y Velázquez (Sevilla 599 - Madrid 1660) and can be admired in the Frick Collection Museum, Manhattan, New York, USA. Then we see Antoni Desclergues' (DC06) initials on the chapel's artwork and its oldest surviving drawing. Each item is separately shown in Figures 49.36 on page 1002, 49.35 on page 1002, and Figure 49.8 on page 997.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06) used 'ADXCRF' as initials, shown in Figure 49.2 and referring to his knighthood and service to H. M. King Felipe IV of Spain. Alternatively, he also added 'EHR' to his signature, having the same meaning and shown in Figure 34.2 on page 520. His Majesty was the feudal lord of the ground on which the chapel in Deerlijk, described in this chapter, was built in 1639. That Marguerite Kelduwier was not the only person to support constructing the chapel in Deerlijk is proven by evidence found in the archives of Arras, stating the establishment of the chapel was realized thanks to the devout donations of certain persons, or, in Dutch,
'Twelck oock daernaert geschiet is want door de godtvruchtige giften van sommighe ende ...'[2]

49.1 El Suelo del Reposo - Introduction

In Chapter 29.5.8, the arrival of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), father of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), in Harelbeke is outlined, specifically witnessed by Maestro de Campo Luis del Villar, shown in Figures 29.24 and 29.25 on page 393 in Chapter 29.5.2, preserved in the handwriting of Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergue and kept in the archives at Urgell in Spain.

In Chapter 29.12, we have introduced the location of the Spanish barracks between Deerlijk and Harelbeke. On that spot, the Leie River had a calm section East of Harelbeke, nicknamed Ten Rust (Reposo). Figure 49.4 offers a closer look at this particular strip and shows that there was a Chapel called Ten Rust, Saint Anne's church, at the junction of Kleine Heerweg en Grote Heerweg at the end of the 17th century. In Chapter 48.9.5.4.5, we have seen that the area has also served as the crossing point by the British during the liberation in 1918, where the bank South of the Leie River was used as a bridgehead.

The area was chosen for several military strategic reasons and mainly served as the ground to find rest, i.e., El Suelo del Reposo. 'Rest' is what this location was known for because, in the North, it was a gateway to the Leie River, where the river was tranquil and had very flat shores, similar to a beach. In old Flemish, the word kust was not reserved for a marine coast but also existed to describe river flanks, i.e., rivierkust. Perhaps the origins of another nearby chapel, Kutskapel, should be searched in this context as a corruption of the word kust, or even the Spanish counterpart Costa.

Kuts cotemporarily means fever. Its ancient roots are interesting in the context of a tranquil river with a weak flow. Indeed, Olivier van Renswoude[3] published an extensive study of the Dutch word koorts which is kuts in Flemish. He concludes that the word originates from the Germanic word kurtisonq, which means 'weak' and later evolved into the meaning of 'fever' or 'being feverish.' From this work, we copy, for future reference, the sources used by Renswoude, i.e., R. S. Beekes[4], L. De Bo[5], R. Derksen[6], J. and W. Grimm[7], E. Hellquist[8], H.& W. Meid Krahe[9], W. P. Lehmann[10], M. Mayrhofer[11], J. Müller[12], M. Philippa et al[13], D. Ringe and A. Taylor[14], J. C. von Schmid[15], M. de Vaan[16], J. de Vries[17], Fr. Woeste[18], and also some dictionaries[19].

Therefore, we assume that the tranquil Leie River section was initially called 'weak' in Germanic and evolved simultaneously to kuts and rust because both words have the same semantic root. It may be why there used to be a chapel called Kutskapel nearby[20]. Such a tranquil river section was essential to embark on or rest if a boat continued its journey upstream afterward. It was also ideal for the military to gather ships and load them in calm water before taking off.

Figure 49.3: The Convent and Sanctuary of la Serra in Montblanc is where the original statue is found, after which the one that played a role in the miracle in Deerlijk was copied.

Figure 49.4: This map of the end of the 17th century shows the Leie River between Beveren and Harelbeke, where the Spanish military could quickly embark their ships and where the river was tranquil. On that spot, nicknamed Ten Rust, there was a Saint Anne chapel that the map maker mistakenly called Ten Rust. To the Spanish, the whole area between Deerlijk and Harelbeke, headed by the Overacker Manor equally visible on this map, was a resting place or a spot to set up their camps. It's, therefore, no wonder that a new Chapel at Deerlijk, constructed in 1639, carried a similar name. More extensive views of this map can be found in Figure 29.32 on page 396 and Figure 29.208 on page 454.

The location may also have been fordable during some periods, which may have been the fundamental reason for a town like Harelbeke to develop nearby.

The site was prone to invasions from the North and required military protection, yet another reason to install military there.

The Spanish associated the whole area West of Deerlijk and South of Harelbeke as a place of rest. The Chapel at Deerlijk, constructed in 1639, naturally received the name Kapel-ter-Ruste, La Capilla del Reposo, or 'The Chapel of Nuestra Señora del Reposo.'

A close-up of the river where the Saint Anne chapel was located and referred to as Ten Rust on the map at the end of the 17th century is shown in Figure 49.4. More extensive views can be found in Figure 29.32 on page 396 and Figure 29.208 on page 454.

The Chapel in Deerlijk, established in 1639, is undeniably a locally rooted Spanish conception that has determined the village's landscape since its erection. The 18th-century legend formerly narrating the story of the Chapel's foundation was socially so well embedded and affirmed that it must have undoubtedly been rooted in a factually based local tale in which a Knight or Nobleman was involved.

Records-based research in the regional and French ecclesiastic administration has revealed that Marguerite Kelduwier, the widow of banker Jean du Bois, initiated the foundation act and financial support. Her descendants were wealthy, and even the Romans knew about the rich, that 'Dives est qui sibi nihil deesse putat.'

Further research, however, on the witnesses involved with the miracle of 1634 used as official raison d' être to establish a Chapel, revealed a clan all personally connected to our paternal ancestor, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), a Catalan Knight, born in Barcelona, Spain, son of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and described in Chapter 37.

Circumstantial research of the 1639 period in Deerlijk indicates that constructing a new chapel near Deerlijk's main church may only have been possible under solid support by the Spanish regime. The cleric who collected the testimonies was a Portuguese provost of the Saint Salvator church in Harelbeke. At the same time, the Bishop, whose approval was needed, had known Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) father, Jeroni Desclergue (DCO5), outlined in Chapter 29, since the end of the 16th century in Cambrai.

Beatrice Declercq, the spouse of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), hailed from the distinguished Declercq family of Kortrijk and Doornik, outlined in Chapter 34.13. This family maintained robust ties with prominent local financial dynasties, including influential bankers and merchants such as the Du Bois, Andries, Braye, and Grimaldi families. Consequently, it is reasonable to assert that Antoni Desclergue possessed a more formidable network than Marguerite Kelduwier. Without his discreet support and extensive connections in Tournai and with the Spanish regime, Marguerite would have been unable to establish a chapel in such proximity to the main church of Deerlijk.

When the Chapel in Deerlijk was constructed in 1639, Flanders' Count was Felipe IV of Spain, introduced in Chapter 8.8.4. He was the King of Castile, Leon, Aragon, the Duke of Brabant, Luxemburg, etc., and equally the count of Flanders, Artésie etc. The Chapel was built on the count's domain of the Spike (Spijker) of Harelbeke. The Chaplaincy and the land on which the Chapel stood were, therefore, ultimately owned by the Count of Flanders, H.M. King Felipe IV of Spain, shown in Figure 49.2, not Harelbeke and not Deerlijk.

The mentioned Bishop of Tournai was Maximilien II Vilain de Gand, an accomplice of the Spanish regime and well-connected to Archdukes Albrecht and Isabella, described in Chapter 8.8.3 and Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his father Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). The Archdukes carried strong responsibility for the contra-reformation in Flanders and for celebrating the bond between the Catholic faith and the Flemish-Spanish victory at Oostende in 1604, where Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), Antoni's father, had died a hero in the final combat, as described in Chapter 29.5.28.

While Maximilien II Vilain de Gand was still a priest at Cambrai, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) had liberated the town in 1595. He had been hospitalized there at the Saint-Jean hospital for a severe wound in the face, as shown in Chapter 29.5.19 and Chapter 29.5.20. Therefore, there is no doubt that the Bishop personally knew Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), Antoni Desclergue's father, in his former role as priest.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06), primarily a military, was not wealthy and needed local financial support to establish the Chapel. Marguerite Kelduwier and her Du Bois family were affluent. They must have considered a new chapel as an essential key to unlocking more power. At the same time, they needed the miracle at Deerlijk and the Spanish influence from Antoni Desclergue (DC06) to realize their project.

By joining forces, both families could achieve their goals.

Antoni's involvement has solidified into the local legend of a Knight or Nobleman. He witnessed the miracle, while the contribution of the Du Bois family has more clearly survived in the written records because they owned the Chapel. Recent investigations, however, discovered physical evidence of Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) involvement. At the same time, the documents the Du Bois family stored were never signed nor sealed by the Bishop and are, therefore, untrustworthy or incomplete.

Artwork in the Chapel contains an image of the Plaza Mayor of Montblanc, the hometown of the Desclergues in Spain, with their house Casal dels Desclergue and in the background, the Saint Michael's Church of Montblanc, seen in Figure 49.5, and shows Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) signature, shown in Chapter 49.3.3.3.

Two figures depicted in the Montblanc scene represent Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) (as Saint Hieronymus) and his wife Felipa de Montoya y Diaz (as Saint Felipa). The face of the Saint Hieronymus depiction is that of distantly blood-related Hernán Cortés de Monroy, as explained in Chapter 27.2 and Chapter 25.1.3.2, and described in Chapter 27.20.

Early inscriptions on the Chapel are of Saint Hieronymus and form references to the life of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). The Chapel's original architecture was Spanish, and a giant S above the entrance, a sign preserved after a 19th-century restoration, still catches the eye.

Finally, Spanish sculptor Alonso Cano created the Chapel's miraculous Baroque statuette of Mary around 1639. The legend of the statue's early appearance is similar to that of Scherpenheuvel and is, therefore, firmly bonded to the victory at Ostend in 1604. Curiosities such as the Chapel's dimensions and orientation form additional indications.

The Chapel was, therefore, the realization of honra a tu padre y a tu madre and is a tribute of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) to his parents Jeroni (DC05) and Felipa, under the financial aegis of Marguerite Kelduwier.

Indeed, although he was a respectable military and nobleman, Antoni was not wealthy and, therefore, the actual creation of the Chapel was done by Marguerite Kelduwier, the banker's widow from Lille with roots in Deerlijk, who found in this opportunity a way to increase her family's power and obtain access to the Catholic University of Leuven.

Mary statuettes and crucifixes were ubiquitous in Catholic Flanders. The erection of a chapel does not exclude dozens of such symbols at other places in Deerlijk, such as junctions or alleys, before 1639. Every family must have had one at home or its entrance. The unicity of the one inside the Chapel is that it shows no signs caused by weather or wear and is of the hand of Spanish sculptor Cano, making it a remarkable historical, artistic object.

This chapter summarizes the author's research and discoveries in the framework of earlier findings and studies by respectable investigators on the local history of Deerlijk, such as Benoit and Uyttenhove[21][22], Bruggeman[23], Defraeye[24], Despriet[25][26], Dhaluin[27][28], Uyttenhove[29] and others. Without the valuable preliminary and ongoing work of these giants, the author could never have reached his conclusions.[30]

The Chapel in Deerlijk, constructed in 1639 under the aegis of the Spanish Knight Antoni Desclergue during the Spanish regime, remains a subject of considerable debate. On one side, there are those who view the Chapel as a continuation of Deerlijk's medieval heritage, untouched by external influences and dating from before the iconoclasm and the Counter-Reformation. On the other hand, there are those who acknowledge the historical evidence of Spanish influence.

It is not uncommon for the Flemish and Walloons to overlook the Spanish period, often associating it with occupation and oppression. This perspective has been shaped by years of indoctrination through literature from the Dutch North, the subsequent inundation of our country by other powers, and recent experiences with wars of occupation in the twentieth century.

However, it is essential to recognize that history is complex and multifaceted. The narrative of a purely Germanic heritage, untouched by foreign influence, is a romanticized version of the past that does not align with historical facts. The reality is that our history is a rich blend of cultures and influences, including the Spanish.

Embracing this truth does not diminish our heritage but enriches it, providing a fuller understanding of our past. Through this broader perspective, we can truly appreciate the diverse influences that have shaped our identity.

The Chapel's location is in the East of the plane where the Spanish military resided in Barracks. At the beginning of the 12-year truce between the Dutch States and Spain, in 1609, a chapel called Kapelle ter Bede had been established near Kortrijk on the opposite side. During the Chapel's construction in Deerlijk, the Spanish had to fight two fronts since intensity had increased near the border with France. The desire for rest or reposo could never have been more pressing.

In what follows, we present historical or written evidence on artwork and in church records in Chapter 49.2. The evidence shows Antoni Desclergue's signature on a sculpture inside the Chapel and the oldest surviving drawing. Ecclesiastic records show that everyone involved with the miracle was connected to Antoni. Then, in Chapter 49.3, other evidence is presented pointing at Antoni Desclergue as éminence grise, such as the presence of 13 temple flowers on each panel, the Plaza Mayor of Montblanc with the house of Desclergue in one of the panels. We also go deeper into ultraviolet experiments that revealed Antoni's signature.

Then, in Chapter 49.4, we have a closer look at the artwork in the Chapel, brought from Spain by Antoni Desclergue. An entire narrative is presented on Spanish sculptor Alonso Cano, who made the miraculous statue of Mary with Jesus. A comparison is made between the figurine and other works of Cano. We equally propose why the child Jesus has blond hair, which is linked to the Desclergues' connection with Carlos Coloma and the ancient history of the Desclergues in Mallorca, described, for instance, in Chapter 18.

An infrared investigation is presented as evidence that the panels originally belonged to the initial retable and were recycled to form the Seven Sorrows of Mary.

Consequently, in Chapter 49.5, we present a narrative of the miracle of 1634 with details of the recorded testimonies. The similarities with the wonder of Montblanc are narrated in Chapter 49.6 and are evidence that the original statue, hanging in a tree in Deerlijk, must have been a copy of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc, as shown in Figure 49.1, probably brought by Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) from his hometown.

Despite Antoni Desclergue's importance in establishing the Chapel, Marguerite Kelduwier was the proprietary and financial backbone for the establishment and further care. She is described, with her husband Jean du Bois, in Chapter 49.9.

Obtaining more power must have been Marguerite Kelduwier's motivation, while Antoni Desclergue's motivation was to honor his parents, Jeroni and Felipa, outlined in Chapter 49.10. Antoni Desclergue, a Spanish Knight, firmly stemming from Knights Templar and grandson of a notary in Montblanc, possessed the necessary educational level to incorporate subtle indications of his contribution and the Chapel's aim to honor his parents. These clues are indicated in Chapter 49.11 and may intrigue the Chapel's visitors in the future. The facts are genuine, although some may be exciting coincidences and baffle the spectator.

The legend of the Chapel's origin is given in Chapter 49.12.

It would be presumptuous to underestimate the intellect and discernment of Deerlijk's inhabitants. The deeply entrenched belief in the legend of the Chapel suggests that this confidence was undoubtedly grounded in substantial historical evidence.

Indeed, from the current work, we learn that the nobleman in Deerlijk's legend was not de Cassina but Antoni Desclergue (DC06), a Catalan Knight born in Barcelona and residing in Deerlijk.

The Chapel has had a complicated history during its four centuries of existence, partially revealed in Chapter 49.13.

The reader may be interested to read that the Desclergues maintained a connection with the Chapel during its long history, some of which is revealed in Chapter 49.13.5.

49.2 Historical Evidence

49.2.1 Antique Images of the Chapel's Original Spanish Architecture Reveal Antoni Desclergues' Initials

Historical or written evidence is what genealogists and historians search for, even when other proof is available, such as artwork, described in Chapter 49.4, and Chapter 49.3, or archaeology described in Chapter 49.4.2. Here, we provide written evidence found on the artwork, while Chapter 49.2.2, unravels the ecclesiastic registers. More historical records are provided in Chapter 49.5 and Chapter 49.9.

Figure 49.6: Left is a drawing of the chapel in Deerlijk by Antoine Baillet, the oldest surviving image. The chapel looked mainly Spanish and even more so Portuguese. The circular window contained the 'S' already - Indeed, Portuguese churches more often show earthly signs and shields than Spanish. The Spanish and Portuguese Kingdoms were united from 1580 until 1640. The year 1639 is also visible by anchors above the windows. The complete image is shown in Figure 49.8 on page 997. The photos on the right are of churches from the 17th century or older in Portugal. From left to right: Igreja Matriz de Alenquer; Igreja de São Pedro de Alenquer; and Igreja da Misericórdia de Ansião. Lambda and Delta shapes appear above the door, typical for Portugal and the Portuguese colonies (described in Part XII). The two rectangular windows with the circular one above are similar to the composition of the chapel facade at Deerlijk. The towers are also akin.

Figure 49.7: The white dashed zones show areas where the mason had difficulties squeezing bricks when constructing the new window. At the top, there are even signs of a repair after a collapse. The blue arrows show the zones above and below the original windows, where the bricks are still where they were initially located. The white arrows indicate the zone between the bottom and top of the original windows, and it can be seen that bricks have been squeezed in those areas. The analysis suggests that the original circle with 'S' must have been at approximately the exact location as it is now, and the original windows were either rectangular or slightly curved. Still, the new bricks were placed in a rectangle to preserve the wall's symmetry. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

on page 1002, and on the oldest surviving drawing of the chapel in Figure 49.8.

Besides the initials on both tokens, old images are of crucial importance, as they always show the chapel with a window left and right above the entrance and a circular window straight on top. For instance, a drawing by A. Baillet[31] representing the chapel's legend and dating from the 17th or 18th century, likely based on, or even copied from earlier drawings soon after the chapel's construction in 1639, not only reveals Anton Desclergues' initials but also shows the chapel with a facade[32] similar to Spanish chapels, particularly in Catalonia, but also elsewhere in Iberia. The windows were replaced in 1884, after which the Spanish aspect was no longer there to relish.

A comparison of the chapel with others in Iberia is shown in Figure 49.6. Other examples of similar chapels in Spain include : Ermita de la Mare de Deu dels Torrens de Vimbodi; Ermita de la Mare de Deu en el Montsant; Mare de Deu de la Mola-Buira-El pont;Ermita de l' Abellera; Ermita Santa Bàrbara in Blanes; Ermita de San Roque Goian; Ermita de Santa Quiteria; and Ermita de Sant Francesc de Blanes. In this context, we equally highlight Ermita de Sant Josep de Montblanc, constructed in the 17th century.

The chapel had a different look in the past, and as Philippe Despriet indicated in his article, the facade changed during the restorations of 1884. More precisely, he states that the shape of the windows has changed, which he has proven by comparison with old images and a restoration plan. Physical evidence, explored by the author, is still found with the naked eye in Figure 49.7 and, with infrared, in Figures 49.105 and 49.106 on page 1030.

49.2.2.1 Birds of a Feather

'Birds of a Feather,' or 'Show me your friends and I will tell you who you are,' is a valuable technique to find a person by investigating evidence concerning his entourage.

First, in Chapter 49.2.2.2, we show the importance of bishop Villain de Gand in establishing the chapel and the fact that he knew Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) father Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). Then, in Chapter 49.2.2.3, we show that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was close with the witnesses of the 1634 miracle. The latter is demonstrated by ecclesiastic documents revealing that the families frequently witnessed baptisms and marriages.

[32] The facade is on the Westside, where the entrance is.

Jacob Maximilian Villain de Gand (1569 — Tournai, November 29, 1644) was a bishop of Tournai.[33][34][35][36][37][38][39] One may nowadays still observe a tomb in the cathedral of a cousin of his, François Gilbert Vilain de Gand, shown in Figure 49.31 on page 1001. The majestic Romanesque cathedral of Tournai is shown in Figure 49.32 on page 1001.

He also appears in the literature as Maximilien II Villain de Gand, Maximilianus Vilanus a Gandavo, Maximilien Villain de Gand, and Max Villain.

The first aspect he had in common with Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was that his mother's name was also Felipa or Philipote.

His education ensured he was aware of the great Spanish empire compared to most of the locals in Flanders. For instance, he studied at the University of Pont-à-Mousson[40], shown in Figure 49.9, between Metz and Nancy and at the University of Douai.

Mgr Villain de Gand was known and referred to in the literature as a pious person who applied his prerogatives firmly and did not shy away from conflicts such as with the collegial chapter of Tournai, the Dominicans of Lille or even nuncio Richard Pauli-Stravius. He was a man not subdued by bankers or other earthly powers. His character is revealed in Chapter 49.2.2 and Chapter 49.5, where he refused to sign an essential document.

Mgr Villain de Gand's commitment to principles is evident in his written works. For instance, Manuale pastorum ad usum ecclesiarum civitatis et dioecesis Tornacensis (1625) is a manual for priests in the Diocese of Tournai, Speculum sacerdotum (1634) points at the moral duties of priests, while Methodus sacrum Missae sacrificium celebrandi romano ritu (1641) tells again how to celebrate the Mass in the Roman Catholic Church.

Before becoming the Bishop of Tournai, appointed by Archduke Albert and, therefore, carrying the Spanish victory at Ostend of 1604 close to the heart, he was a priest and later a canon at Cambrai since December 12, 1587, and soon after additionally a member of the collegiate chapter of Tournai.

At Cambrai, Antoni's father Jeroni (DC05), as described in Chapter 29.5.19 and Chapter 29.5.20, was hospitalized after the Spanish had successfully reconquered the town from the French in 1596.

The position elevation to Bishop of Tournai occurred in 1616.

Soon after, in 1617, Carlos Coloma de Saa became the governor of Cambrai, described in Chapter 34.5.15.

In 1641, Antoni Desclergue, or his brother Jeroni Desclergue (DC06c), donated money to the Saint John Hospital of Cambrai on behalf of his father, Jeroni, described in Chapter 34.5.17.

Maximilien II Villain de Gand was also a close relative of Philippe Lamoral Villain de Gand, born in 1587 and married Marguerite Isabelle de Merode, the daughter of Charles Philippe de Merode, on November 22, 1611.

Marguerite Isabelle de Merode's daughter was Marguerite Villain de Gand, born in 1622, and she married Ferdinand Philippe de Merode of Westerlo. In Chapter 29.5, we describe how Jeroni Desclergue had liberated the castle of de Merode at Westerloo in 1591. The other children of Marguerite Isabelle de Merode were Balthazar Philippe de Villain de Gand (1616) and Isabelle Claire de Villain de Gand (1619).

As an author, Villain published funeral sermons for Archduke Albrecht (1621) and Archduchess Isabella (1633), as well as a pastoral handbook (1625). He also gave the funeral oration of Albert of Austria, described in Chapter 8.8.3.

He was at the origin of the founding in Lille in 1627 of a convent of penitent nuns known as Capuchins, an order created by Françoise de Saint-Omer.

Jacob Maximilian Villain de Gand was the youngest son of Maximilian Vilain (Ghent, 1530 - Tournai, June 5 1583), who held important positions in the Spanish Netherlands and energetically defended the Catholic cause. King Philip II of Spain, described in Chapter 8.8.1, appointed him to his Council of State in 1576 and made him head of Finance in the Netherlands. His loyalty to the king was rewarded with elevation to Count of Isenghien in 1582. Maximilian Vilain has also been the governor of Lille, which is how he must have been in touch with the banker Jean du Bois, the husband of Marguerite Kelduwier.

In his role as the Bishop of Tournai, Maximilien II Villain de Gand was the ecclesiastic superior who had to approve the miracle at Deerlijk of 1634 and the establishment of a chapel Kapel-ter-Ruste around 1639.

Given his past in Cambrai, he knew Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Antoni Desclergue (DC06). In contrast, through his father, he must also have known Jean du Bois and Marguerite Kelduwier, the two bankers without which the expensive undertaking could never have occurred. Connected to the family of de Merode, Jeroni's intervention in Westerloo in 1591 must equally have been appreciated.

Finally, Maximilien II Villain de Gand's admiration for Archduke Albert, whose funeral he preceded in 1621, and the Spanish admiration for Mary of Scherpenheuvel and her assumed role in the victory at Ostend in 1604 convinced the Bishop to offer his support for establishing the chapel.

Interestingly showing the close connection between the Bishop of Tournai and the Spanish regime is that Julie Piront[41] writes that the nuns arrived in Tournai in 1624. Their cloister at Tournai was made possible by a license given at Brussels on May 4, 1621, and confirmed on May 15 by Andrea Soto, the general commissar of H.R.H. the Princess of Spain. She writes that at that time (1615-1644), the Bishop of Tournai was Maximilien II Vilain de Gand. The founder of the cloister, Catherine, received a letter of recommendation on June 18, 1621, from the Archiducs Albrecht and Isabella. However, the city of Tournai would become French in 1667 under Louis XIV.

49.2.2.3 The Bonds Between Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and the Other Miracle Witnesses of 1634

To learn about Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) network in Deerlijk, we redirect the reader first to Chapter 34.5.13, where his appearances are studied, and the witnesses involved with the 1634 miracle are described. Details of the miracle are outlined in Chapter 49.5, more precisely in Chapter 49.5.4.

Here, we add more records to clarify the network around Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and the persons who witnessed the wonder.

In Figure 49.10, Beatrice, the wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), became, on September 9, 1638, in Deerlijk, the godmother of Jan de Vos, son of Michael de Vos and Anne Tackx, with Jan Montens as godfather.

In Figure 49.11, we found a Jan Montens, son of Jan Montens senior, who came from Deerlijk and married Margriet De Vos in Beveren Leie on August 17, 1639, with Franciscus de Vos as a witness.

In Figure 49.12, the couple baptized their first child in Vichte on May 22, 1640, and their subsequent children in Deerlijk.

We also found this Franciscus de Vos as godfather, together with godmother Petronella Vermeersch, of Elisabeth Kelduwier ('Calluier') in Deerlijk on August 20, 1643, daughter of Judocus Kelduwier and Elisabeth Stalins, shown in Figure 49.24.

In Figure 49.13, in April 1648, a certain Joannes Stalins married in Zwevegem with Joanna Kelduwier ('Quellerie'). We have not been able to establish a relationship, but it is still worthwhile to mention.

In Figure 49.14, it was not the first meeting as godparents. Less than a year after the miracle, Beatrijs De Ghelinck ('Gelyct'), daughter of Willem De Ghelinck and Maria ('Maeyken') Seynaeve, was baptized on May 1, 1635 in Deerlijk. The godfather was Jan Montens, the son of Jan, and the godmother was, here too, Beatrice, the wife of Antoni Desclergue.

In Figure 49.15, interestingly, as described in Chapter 37.4, where we outline the family Ximenez de la Cruz, we find Willem De Ghelinck ('Guillemus Dinghelinc') as a witness on March 26, 1666, at Ghent Spaniard Castle, on the wedding of Juan de los Rios and Maria Francisca Gregori. The other witness was Petrus Ximenez de la Cruz.

In Figure 49.15, we found a link with Marcus Van Marcke, also present at the miracle. On August 4, 1631, Beatrice Van Marcke was born in Deerlijk, the daughter of Willem Van Marcke and Martine Wautier. The godfather was Marcus Van Marcke, and the godmother was Beatrice, the wife of Antoni Desclergue. Figure 34.120 on page 559 indicates Spanish links with the Van Marcke family in 1651. Another connection was found in 1644 in Figure 49.30 on page 1000.

In Figure 49.16, when, at Deerlijk on October 11, 1640, Pere Declerque (DC07d), son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was baptized, Martine Wautier was godmother, while Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) was godfather.

In Figure 49.17, also interesting is the baptism of Judocus Deckere, son of Martinus Deckere and Magdalena Kelduwier ('De Caluwe'), with Judocus van Oosthuyse the godfather, and Beatrice, the wife of Antoni Desclergue, the godmother, in 1644. The family Deckere was linked to Martina de la Cruz, the daughter-in-law of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), as shown in Chapter 37.4.3, in Figure 37.34 on page 652. Her godfather was Paulus Deckere or Deckers.

In Figure 49.18, on January 9, 1646, Beatrijs Wolfcarius was baptized at Deerlijk, daughter of Stephanus Wolcarius and Elisabeth Kelduwier ('de Caluudue'). The godfather was Willem Beyls, and the godmother was Beatrice, the wife of Antoni Desclergue.

In Figure 49.19, six years earlier, at Deerlijk, on May 10, 1640, we already found the baptism of Valentinus Wolfcarius, son of Stephanus Wolfcarius and Elisabeth Kelduwier ('Decaluwe'). The godfather was Valentin Bekaert, and the godfather was Magdalena Amaye.

In Figure 49.20, we would also like to point out that Valentin Bekaert, also involved in the miracle in Deerlijk, was married to Joanna de Croix and had his daughter Maria Bekaert baptized in Deerlijk on January 19, 1641. The godfather was Antoni Desclergue, and the godfather was Maria Degroote. Perhaps Joanna de Croix was also from the Ximenez de la Cruz clan.

In Figure 49.21, note that a certain Thomas Bekaert married Joanna Van Rumbeke at Harelbeke on February 19, 1612. The bride's brother was Jacobus Van Rumbeke, father of Joanna Van Rumbeke, who married Mathias Du Puich (Vandeputte or Steenput) in Harelbeke in 1662. The couple had a son, Egidius, who married Maria Declercgz (DC08d), daughter of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz and granddaughter of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Beatrix Declercq. More information can be found in Chapter 37.9.2.

On December 17, 1619, Jan Montens married Joana Bekaert in Harelbeke. The witness at that marriage was Claes ('Nicolaes') Montens, together with Arnoldus Vanhoutte. Claes Montens assisted in the miracle. In Figure 49.22, We equally found a Claes Montens 19 years earlier as godfather in Harelbeke.

There is a Claes Montens, as an inhabitant of Desselgem, who appeared on the Lists of Bourgeois Forains of Kortrijk in 1634 and is also mentioned in the orphan register as Nicolais Montens[42].

On January 13, 1595, Anna Desclergue (DC06f), the daughter of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), was baptized in Kortrijk, as can be read in Chapter 29. She married widower Vincent Stalins in Waregem on September 6, 1620, witnessing Anna's mother Felipa and Joannes de Wilde. Her husband had previously been married to Marie Deman on February 24, 1609, in Waregem. The marriage witnesses were the chaplain and the sexton, and the marriage received the priest's permission of Izegem. We deduce from this, as can often be found in ecclesiastical documents from that period in our region, that Vincent Stalins had a temporary position in Waregem. Although it is not explicitly stated that he was a soldier, it is a logical thought line. We suspect that it was this witness Joannes de Wilde, who would also later function as the godfather of Florence Vermeersch, together with godmother Florence Decostere, in Harelbeke on March 20, 1642[43].

On April 15, 1640, Maria Decostere was baptized in Harelbeke, daughter of Egidius Decostere and Catarina Vermandere ('Vermandele'). The godmother was Maria Ducx, and the godfather was Willem Vermandere ('Guillelmus Vermandele'). The latter was also involved in the miracle. In Figure 49.23.

In Figure 49.13, we continue with the wedding of Anna Desclergue (DC06f) and Vincent Stalins. Anna Desclergue (DC06f) had twins, Petrus and Joannes, baptized in Waregem on October 8, 1626. Jean du Breucq ('Joannes de Bucker'), Godeliva Crispel, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), and Judoca Van Brabant were the godparents. Anna died in 1627, and all her children died before 1627. War may have caused devastation in 1625. Indeed, on December 6, 1625, a regiment of Neapolitans[44], under the command of the maestro di campo Marcello del Judicis (Marcelo del Guidice), marched to Kortrijk[45]. This regiment consisted of 15 companies of foot soldiers. Three days before that, they had left the Castellanies of Aalst and Dendermonde, where they had stayed for several months. The fifteen companies were divided over the garrison towns of Oudenaarde (5), Roeselare (1), Tielt (1), and Kortrijk (8)[46].

On April 1648, Joannes Stalin married in Sint Denijs Zwevegem to Joanna Kelduwier ('Quellerie'). We have not demonstrated a correlation between these Stalins and those mentioned above, but we cannot rule out a relationship.

In Figure 49.24, on August 20, 1643, a particular Elisabeth Kelduwier ('Calluier') was baptized in Deerlijk, daughter of Judocus Kelduwierand Elisabeth Stalins, with Franciscus de Vos and Petronella Vermeersch the godparents.

In Figure 49.25, Joannes Kelduwier ('Kelduier') was baptized in Deerlijk on 20 November 1644, son of Judocus Kelduwier and Elisabeth Stalins. Joannes Kelduwier and Annabel Roman were the godparents.

In Figure 49.26, On July 22, 1640, in Templeuve, 8 km southeast of Lille, Jean Dubrucq and Catherine du Bois's wedding took place. The couple, Jean Dubrucq and Françoise du Bois lived in the same village during that period. In 1655, Isabella (Elizabeth) Stalins married Philippe Albert de la Motte Baraffes in Ypres on January 29. The latter family owned the manor of Deerlijk.

In Figure 49.27, Pieter Wielandt, equally involved in the miracle, also existed, as is evident from the Lists of Bourgeois Forains of Kortrijk, from 1628 and 1638[47]. Not much information was found about Pieter Wielandt, present at the miracle, except that he was probably buried in Deerlijk on August 9, 1666.

In Figure 49.28, in Ghent, at the church of Saint Nicolas, we found a marriage of Pieter Wielandt ('Wylant') and Barbara Hebbelynck[48], without witnesses except for the parish priest of Saint Bavo. We have insufficient information to conclude that it concerns the same Pieter Wielandt, who went to live in Ghent for a while and perhaps later returned to Deerlijk, but it is an exciting line of thought. 1620 was, in fact, at the end of the twelve-year truce in the Eighty Years' War when tension was rising in our country and in the overseas territories where the VOC abused the truce to defend its position vis-à-vis the Iberians. Perhaps he was involved in reinforcement works in Ghent, preparing to end the ceasefire. The Saint Nicolas Church of Ghent is located in the street Cataloniastraat, a few hundred meters from the Spaniard Castle. A man from Deerlijk who had lived at the Spaniard Castle should undoubtedly have known the Desclergues.

In Harelbeke, Noel Declercq, father-in-law of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), witnessed a wedding on November 19, 1621, of Mathieu Casiere and Christina du Bois ('de Bo'). It's possible that Christina du Bois was a relative of Jean du Bois. In Figure 49.29, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) ('De Clergs') is, for instance, also found in 1644 in Deerlijk, and in Figure 49.30 as godfather to Anthonius van Marcke, son of Guilelmus (Willem) van Marcke and Martine Wautier; the godmother was Ghuilelma van Ounackere. Another connection was found in 1631 in Figure 49.15 on page 999.

49.3 Other Evidence of Antoni Desclergue's Persuasive Role

49.3.1 Éminence Grise

As outlined in Chapter 34.5, Chapter 49.2.2, and specifically in Chapter 34.5, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) exercised military power and could influence the Spanish regime and the ecclesiastic sphere required to obtain approval to construct a chapel, without holding an official administrative civil, financial or religious leadership position. His ancestors were of purple-blood nobility and stood above everyone, poor or rich.

As éminence grise, his situation was ideal for supporting banker Marguerite Kelduwier, described in Chapter 49.9, to establish a chapel, which she desired to solidify power while securing a healthy financial resource for the establishment and maintenance of the chapel.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06) had personal motives to establish a chapel, described in Chapter 49.10, but was likely not interested in its maintenance or financing because, as a military, he was not opulent.

As the guiding light, steered by deeply personal motives, he has played a significant role as éminence grise.

Still, while not the financier or the chapel's owner, he remained invisible in the financial and religious accounts of the chapel after its foundation. He was, therefore, disregarded in recent investigations, although the legend, described in Chapter 49.12, had always remembered his existence.

Nevertheless, as explained earlier and shown below, physical evidence of his role remains.

49.3.2 Artwork Observed in Visible Light and Signs of Influence by Andreu Ramírez

The first items that draw attention when entering the chapel are the beautiful panels placed in alcoves on the wall.

One of these panels shows the Plaza Mayor of Montblanc, the ancestral home of the Desclergues, explained in Chapter 49.4.2, while another, described in Chapter 49.3.3.3, exhibits Antoni Desclergue's initials.

The panels are all circumvented by 13 roses, which stands for St. Anthony of Padua (Lisbon 1195 - Padua 1231)[50] and represent Antoni Desclergue (DC06).

A close look at Figure 49.33, in comparison with, e.g., Figure 29.16 on page 375, reveals that they are not just flowers. Given the number of petals, they neither represent a rose nor a fleur de Lys. In fact, between the petals, one can see the Knight's cross used by the Templars or the Shield of Malta. Indeed, they are Templar flowers.

In particular, we can refer to Knight's crosses found on tombstones of Templars, such as the Knights Templar Tombstone of St Mary's at Selborne Hampshire, or in La Couvertoirade, where the Knight's cross is ornamented as a flower, almost identical to the ones seen on the frames at Deerlijk.

We may also refer to the Basilicata Potenza Santa Maria del Sepolcro in Italy, where a similar Templar flower appears as a fresco. Furthermore, at the railing of the tower of Belém in Lisbon, Portugal, it can be seen, as well as in the Church of Bures, Suffolk, in the United Kingdom.

Perhaps more importantly, the same templar flowers are also found in Santa Coloma de Queralt near Montblanc, as can be seen in Figure 29.16 on page 375.

As to who the artist who made the polychrome panels found in Deerlijk was, we are still determining the answers. Since section Chapter 49.3.3 shows that initials are placed on one of them, indicating that they are likely fabricated in the Conca de Barberà, i.e., in or near Montblanc, we can search for the artist or his school.

When we study the persons depicted on the polychrome panels in the chapel in Deerlijk, we see remarkable similarities in style with the works of the Catalans Damià Forment and Andreu Ramírez. Because we only know when Antoni Desclergue brought the art back from Spain, we cannot, in principle, exactly determine when they were made. The artists mentioned lived in the 16th century. The work is likely from someone influenced by these artists. We also see, for example, a tendency to depict fairly robust limbs in the second half of the 17th century, as in the works of Joan Grau. The reader can make the comparison himself by reading an article written by Amorós Albareda and Yeguas Gassó.[51]

[48] The banns were published October 24, 1620, marriage November 8, 1620.

[50] The number 13 is associated with Saint Anthony of Padua, particularly in the context of his miracles or intercessions. Saint Anthony of Padua, also known as Saint Anthony of Lisbon, was a Portuguese Catholic priest and friar of the Franciscan Order who lived in the 12th and 13th centuries. One of the most famous associations with Saint Anthony and the number 13 is the tradition of the 'Thirteen Tuesdays' or 'Thirteen Tuesdays Novena.' This tradition involves praying a novena (a series of prayers repeated over nine days) to Saint Anthony on thirteen consecutive Tuesdays, often to seek his intercession for lost items or other intentions. Devotees believe Saint Anthony will answer their prayers and perform miracles on the thirteenth Tuesday of the novena. Additionally, some legends and stories attribute specific miracles or interventions by Saint Anthony to occurrences on the 13th day of the month or other instances involving the number 13. These associations may vary depending on cultural traditions and regional practices but reflect the deep devotion and belief in Saint Anthony's miraculous powers among his followers.

The heavy limbs can also be found later in the 17th century in Joan Grau's works, which are also mentioned in that article.

We compared work by Andreu Ramírez, in particular, his Santa Magdalena[52] in Sant Sepulcre in Poblet, to a personage found in Deerlijk and the comparison indicates that the artist of the panels in Deerlijk was either from the same school or from a school that was highly influenced by that of Andreu Ramírez. The comparison is shown in Figure 49.44. The likeliness does not prove anything, but it shows that, at least, this type of sculpture existed among artists in Catalonia in the period of interest.

Similarities of sculptured persons in Deerlijk are also found in the work by Francesc Puig I and Jacint Reguer of 1648 in the retable of Sant Andreu at the Santa Maria church of Cervera.

Other similarities are found with the work of Andrea Fortunato de Peregrinis in San Martín del Río, dating from 1590,[53] and Miguel Rubiol of 1604.[54]. The two latter works are also shown in Joan Yeguas i Gassó.[55]

In Figure 49.45, sculptured bricks can be compared.

Around 1634, a sculpturer active in Catalonia, Benet Baró, a Burgundian, made retables of a similar (low) quality and a somewhat similar style of figures as the one in the chapel in Deerlijk. An example is shown in Figure 49.46 on page 1007.[56]

The style matches what was available in Catalonia around 1640 in terms of scholarship, materials, artistic techniques, and artists. We can cite a letter sent to the author:

Estimado Dr. Declercq,

Me ha parecido muy interesante su investigación y le felicito por la publicación del libro. Respecto a su consulta, debo decirle que a primera vista me parece ver una conexión con las obras de un escultor francés activo en la zona de Tarragona entre el final del siglo XVI y los principios del XVII, llamado Benet Baró.
Creo que hay puntos de contacto en cuanto al tipo de relieve, los fondos arquitectónicos, las figuras, etc. Debo decir que el retablo que usted publica ha sido restaurado de forma abusiva. También que Benet Baró era un escultor de poca calidad, a mi parecer...
Espero haberle sido de utilidad.
Saludos.

49.3.3 Observations with Ultraviolet Luminescence and the Discovery of Antoni Desclergue's Signature

49.3.3.1 About Ultraviolet Luminescence

When exposed to ultraviolet radiation (UV)[57], some materials used in art become fluorescent and give off visible light. In particular, traditional natural resin varnishes[58] emit a characteristic yellowish-greenish color.

Observing art under UV makes monitoring the presence or removal of old varnishes possible.

Retouchings covering a layer of varnish also show up clearly in UV because they appear very dark compared to the fluorescent varnish.

While most paints emit very little fluorescence, some pigments and dyes in paint emit a characteristic color appropriate for identifying a particular stain.

49.3.3.2 General Observations

The chapel's polychrome reliefs clearly show during the experiments that they were varnished and painted, which is also noticeable with the naked eye in normal light.

However, each panel is stunning and exposes details thanks to fluorescence that cannot be seen in normal light due to the sloppy repairs.

The 7th panel, shown in Figures 49.36 and 49.35, represents the Tomb of Jesus.

The relief was inspired by Michelangelo Merisi da Caravaggio's painting, who lived from 1571 to 1610 and came from the Milan region. The region belonged for a long time to the crown of Aragon and belonged to Emperor Charles V[59]. The painting was made around 1603 and was based on John's Gospel. As a result, the man on the left is Joseph of Arimathea; the holy woman with Jesus, who appears to bless him, is Mary's mother. The man who holds Jesus' legs is Nicodemus. The woman on the right in the picture who raises her hands is Maria, the wife of Klopas. The latter is not considered a saint.

In contrast to Caravaggio's painting, Mary Magdalene is absent on panel 7 in the chapel, which may hold another clue. Indeed,

[59] Emperor Charles V was King Carlos I of Castile, Aragon, Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, Count of Flanders etc. and is described in Chapter 8.7

Antoni Desclergue was born in Barcelona and baptized in the Marie-Magdalena church in Tournai. Marie-Magdalena, however, also symbolizes the Knights Templar,[60] an order to which Antoni's ancestors were affiliated as extensively explained in Chapter 18.

What makes panel seven special is that initials are depicted in hand-written characters from the first half of the 17th century on the woman's clothing on the right. They are almost invisible in normal light but are very clearly visible during a UV fluorescence experiment[61], as shown in Figure 49.36 and 49.37. The woman character was probably chosen because she was not a saint[62].

Several people have 'signed' the image by drawing their initials in approximately the same color as the woman's robe so that it hardly stands out with the naked eye and in normal light.

Apart from a few crosses at the top, perhaps from some illiterate participants, we see six distinct sets of initials.

We could identify Antoni Desclergue's initials. They are equal to the ones found on the oldest surviving sketch of the chapel, shown in Figure 49.2 on page 49.2.

From that time, letters to the King of Spain show that people used such initial-based signatures. Sometimes, they were real works of art, as shown in Figures 49.39, 49.40, and 49.41.

The ADXCRF signature is marked with an X after AD, representing a Burgundian cross, the Spanish military flag called La Cruz de Borgoña. The cross thus symbolizes the Spanish soldier. The signature says,

'Antoni Desclergue, militar, cabellero del Rey Felipe,' or

'Antoni Desclergue, soldier and knight of King Filip.'

Antoni used a similar acronym in his signature on documents, i.e., EHR, as shown in Figure 34.2 on page 520.

The King was Felipe IV, introduced in Chapter 8.8.4 and shown in Figure 49.43. H. M. Felipe IV was born in Valladolid in 1605 and died in Madrid in 1665. He was King of Spain from 1621 to 1665.

49.4.1 Cano's Miraculous Sculpture of Mary with Jesus

49.4.1.1 Introduction and Ultraviolet Fluorescence Investigation

In Catholic Flanders, Mary's figurines and crucifixes must have been found almost everywhere: at junctions, squares, alley entrances, and even private homes. Consequently, no matter where a miracle happened, figurines were always nearby. The miracle at Deerlijk in 1634 refers to a depiction of Mary in a tree close to the place where the event, described in Chapter 49.5, happened.

The analysis of Figure 49.1 on page 977, based on comparing the oldest surviving depiction of the chapel in Figure 49.8 on page 997 with la Mare de deu de la serra, proves that the 1634 miracle in Deerlijk must have happened at a figurine depicting the patron of Montblanc.

The appearance of a Mary statue in a tree is familiar. It is shared with Scherpenheuvel[63] and in Barcelona[64].

Still, the wooden Baroque sculpture found at the chapel, constructed in 1639, exhibits no weather, wear, sunlight, or dirt marks. As a result, when the chapel was erected in 1639, the sacred place was equipped with a brand new figurine, which was of sufficient symbolic and artistic value that substitution was acceptable. Its impeccable state must have been interpreted by many as a miracle, too.

Almost four centuries later, the author examined the figurine with ultraviolet (UV) light[65], shown in Figure 49.47, and discovered that it has never been masked, whitewashed, or overpainted. Using optical waves of 365 nm, a UV fluorescence experiment on the miraculous statue yielded the following observations:

The sacred polychrome sculpture of Mary with Jesus in the chapel is made of wood, then covered with a gesso layer, and this layer was painted. The figurine was never varnished and never overpainted. We must, therefore, conclude that it is in its original state.

The statue looks very simple but still perfect. It is reminiscent of a hastily made work of art by a talented artist who has done a very masterful job in little time but with unique skills.

By studying the date of fabrication and other works, the author concludes that it is of the hand of Alonso Cano, described in Chapter 49.4.1.2 on shown in Figure 49.47.

Creating such perfection with so much simplicity is only reserved for the greatest.

The gesso appears brown or golden with the naked eye and in normal light. Tinted gesso was typical of Spain in the 16th and 17th centuries when oil-based paints became more popular than the earlier tempera paints, and a new surface was necessary.

Mary's statue in Figure 49.47 does not glow brightly under UV light, possibly due to oil-based paints.

On the other hand, the tempera gesso, seen through a few cracks in the paint layer, has a blue-white appearance under UV light, which means that the artist used egg yolk with lead to prepare the paint, equally characteristic of the 16th and 17th centuries.

49.4.1.2 Spanish Baroque sculptor Alonso Cano (1601-1667)

Alonso Cano, shown in Figure 49.47, was born in Granada on March 19, 1601, and died in Granada in October 1667. He has produced beautiful and impeccable Baroque sculptures, particularly at the end of his life. He must have also been outstanding before, as he received attention from the Spanish King.

Remarkable is that, in 1614, he moved with his family to Sevilla, where he entered the painting school of Francisco Pacheco.[66] The latter had been an apprentice of the famous artist Velazquez.[67]

[60] Marie-Magdalena, often regarded as a symbol of repentance and devotion in Christian tradition, holds a significant emblematic association with the Knights Templar. This medieval Christian military order, officially endorsed by the Catholic Church in the 12th century, played a crucial role during the Crusades. The Templars were known not only for their martial prowess but also for their deep spiritual commitment and complex relationship with sacred relics and figures, including Saint Mary Magdalene.

[62] We assume that souls preferred not to write on the robe of a saint.

[63] The Spanish strongly associated Scherpenheuvel with their victory in Ostend in 1604.

[64] In Barcelona, we refer to Santa Maria del Pi, near where Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was born, described in Chapter 29.5.26 and Chapter 34.4.

[65] On Friday, February 21, 2020, around 7:30 PM, experiments were conducted in the chapel, with ultraviolet light in the dark, which happened in the presence and with the generous assistance of Priest Marc Messiaen, Willy Kemseke, Benjamin Declercq, Anna-Laura Declercq, and Lambert Declercq. While the experiments were carried out, exciting discoveries were made. This experimental research was done long after historical research pointed at Alonso Cano as its creator.

[66] Note that Enric Desclergue (DC05c), uncle of Antoni Desclergue (II) (D06) and described in Chapter 33, was married to Ana Pacheco. We don't know if the two Pachecos were related, but it is worth mentioning.

Typically, a statue of the Virgen del Reposo makes the gesture of the end of breastfeeding Jesus, hence the 'resting' mother. A typical example is in Valverde del Camino, near Helva and Sevilla, shown in Figure 49.48. The original statue from the 1500s and the one inspired by it and exposed in the church from the 1600s until its destruction on July 21, 1936, showed Mary gesturing to cover her breast after feeding Jesus. The statue in Sevilla, like the one in Deerlijk, is, however, different.

Alonso Cano must have known the Virgen del Reposo in Sevilla. Indeed, Nuestra Señora del Reposo of Sevilla is a sculpture from around 1517 located on the cathedral's altar.

In fact, in Spain, similar chapels and churches are not rare. Indeed, we find many chapels and churches named after Nuestra Señora del Reposo, Nuestra Señora del Buen Reposo and la Vírgen del Buen Reposo.

We believe Alonso Cano made his version of this Mary statue, either while in Sevilla or later when he was in Madrid and sold or gave it to Antoni Desclergue (DC06) during their encounter, described in Chapter 34.5.11 and Chapter 34.5.16.

One year before 1639, when Antoni Desclergue (DC06) went to Spain, Alonso Cano moved to Madrid upon invitation by King Felipe IV and Count Olivares.[68] He became an official painter of the Court. During this period, he experimented more with bright colors because he could access the colorful Venetian works there. Prior, his pieces were more colorless. The figurine in Deerlijk must have been a try-out in that period.

After four years in Madrid, Cano's wife was killed, and Alonso Cano was accused of murder, but his guilt was never proven. Again remarkably, he fled during this time of accusation to San Francisco's convent in Valencia, where Carlos Coloma, described in Chapter 34.5.15, originated from and returned to Madrid in 1647 where he became steward of the brotherhood of Nuestra Señora de Los Siete Dolores (Our Lady of the Seven Sorrows).

In 1651, he returned to Granada to become a priest. It was at the end of his life that he made his masterpiece.

So, Cano was in Madrid when Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was there, and clearly, he had connections with Count Olivares and Carlos Coloma, both acquaintances of Antoni (DC06). Because the statue, brought back from Spain by Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was Nuestra Señora del Reposo, the Chapel at Deerlijk was named after it, i.e. Kapel-ter-Ruste, or vice versa.

The Cano family had ties with Flanders and may have known Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), Antoni's father, while he was in the area of Kortrijk. For instance, in December 1597, Isabella Cano was Margareta Borri's godmother, while the godfather was Joan Potosi. In 1612, a wedding at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent took place, of Francisca Ansa from the castle, with Anton Cano, a son of Juan de Fuentes, and Maria Cano from Baeza near Jaen, which is not far from Granada. 1612 was when a sister of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), Juana Desclergue (DC06c), described in Chapter 29.9.1, lived in the Spanish Castle of Ghent.

Even the untrained eye can see the figure's resemblance at the chapel with Alonso Cano's oeuvre in Figure 49.47. His masterpiece, Immaculada de facistol, from 1655, can still be found at Granada's cathedral and was created as pure perfection in Baroque art in 1655-1656. This period was Cano's artistic maturity period. He must have been highly talented before but yet to be perfect.

49.4.1.3 A Closer Look at the Jesus Figurine

The little Jesus is also somewhat specific because of his blond hair. The Desclergues were familiar with a blond-haired Jesus. For instance, the Mare de Déu de la Serra, the patrona of Montblanc, shown in Figure 49.85 on page 1016, exposed blond hair.[69]

Apart from the blond, or golden, hair in the figurine of la Mare de Déu de la Serra, there are no facial resemblances with the little Jesus in Cano's work. More striking concerning the child Jesus are the resemblances with a discovery in Mallorca. The Nuestra Senora de Seu at the Santa Iglesia Catedral de Mallorca indeed carries the same Jesus. Could there have been a reason for sculpturing such a Jesus? Perhaps there is. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) left for Spain shortly after Carlos Coloma's death. The latter had family ties in Deerlijk through his wife, Margareta de Liedekerke. He had been well-known by Antoni (DC06) and his father Jeroni (DC05). Perhaps Margareta had requested or suggested that Antoni bring Mary's Statue with the child Jesus, who looked like the one in Mallorca.

In this context, we must also keep in mind that the Desclergues descend from Ramon Desclergue and Francesc Desclergue, who lived in Mallorca, as explained in Chapter 18.10 and Chapter 18.11.

One observes that the child Jesus at Deerlijk appears to have lost his left arm. We may only guess what the hand looked like or what it was holding. Perhaps a book, as in Figure 49.1 on page 977, or maybe a globe as in the refurbished Statue in Mallorca shown in Figure 49.49.

The Statue in Mallorca initially did not have fingers on Jesus' right hand. Indeed, during the liturgical restoration of Gaudí, when the altarpiece was moved to its current location on the Mirador portal, some small interventions were carried out in this work. The aim was to improve its aesthetic appearance. The fingers of the right hand were added to Jesus' hand, while the polychrome and the gold were retouched[70]. The sculpture was placed in a tabernacle built for this purpose.

Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), his father Jeroni (DC05), and two uncles, Antoni (DC05b) and Enric (DC05c), are all linked to Carlos Coloma, as are found at different places in this book, such as Chapter 29.5.2 and Chapter 34.5.15.

With his Flemish wife Margareta de Liedekerke and his six children, Carlos Coloma resided in Mallorca from 1611 until 1617. The Statue of Nuestra Senora de Seu at Mallorca already existed. It was made at the end of the 14th century and is more than 2 m tall. It used to have a more prominent place in the cathedral but is found inside the cathedral at the Capella de la Santissima Trinitad. The reason is that all Gothic statues had to make room for Baroque art in the 17th century. Guillem Morey created it, and it is Gothic. Jesus holds the globe with a cross in his left hand and blesses the spectator with his right hand, although the original Statue did not have fingers and probably did not 'bless' the spectator. Several copies exist in other churches, and Jesus does not always bless the spectator. In Deerlijk, he also does not seem to praise the spectator.

The similarities between the two Jesuses are eye-catching. A blond child Jesus is not uncommon in Spanish Baroque, but the facial resemblance is striking. A comparison is shown in Figure 49.49.

49.4.2 The Plaza Mayor of Montblanc on a Panel of the Chapel's Original Retable

[70] Llompart Gabriel. 'Nostra Dona de la Seu i el seu desdoblament secular en les diversos devocions marianes' , A. Pascual (coord.), La Seu de Mallorca, Palma, 1995, pp. 53-74.

49.4.2.1 Introduction

Even though Figure 49.1 on page 977 is striking evidence of the chapel's reference to Montblanc, and although the miracle in Deerlijk, described in Chapter 49.5, exposed close similarities with that of Montblanc, described in Chapter 49.6, even more, fascinating is the panel showing the Plaza Mayor of Montblanc, constituting a direct reference to the Desclergues.

When the author discovered that 1639 was a pivotal year in the life of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), he suddenly remembered the chapel of Deerlijk with its year of construction, 1639, visible on the facade. Curious to look in the light of this awareness, he entered the chapel and noticed that one of the panels (panel 3) embedded as an alcove in the right wall depicted the Plaza Mayor of Montblanc. He did the consequent investigations visually. In the final stage, when he had already drawn the most critical conclusions, the author performed Ultraviolet and Infrared experiments in Chapter 49.3.3 and Chapter 49.4.3, resulting in further confirmations, such as Antoni Desclergue's signature and traces of the original Spanish architecture. We logically describe the discoveries and disregard their chronological order.

49.4.2.2 A Visual Study of the Montblanc Panel

The reader may be interested in reading Chapter 5, Chapter 24 and Chapter 7.5 first. Here, we focus solely on panel 3 in the chapel, shown in Figure 49.51. Chapter 49.4.3 provides a study of the others. A visual inspection shows that the polychrome relief was made using techniques prevalent in Spain for making baroque reliefs in the 16th and 17th centuries. However, the artwork was carelessly painted over during a later restoration, as shown in Figure 49.52.

With the naked eye, one can see in Figure 49.52 that, at the male figurine's feet, a sculpture of a lion, a significant part of the artwork's original composition, was tragically demolished during restoration to recycle the retable panels into those fitting Mary's seven sorrows. To better appreciate the 3D nature of this work, a side view is presented in Figure 49.53.

The Gothic square where the two characters are located is the Plaça Major or Plaza Mayor of Montblanc. The investigation is summarized in Figures 49.53, 49.54, 49.55, 49.56, 49.57, 49.58, 49.59, 49.60 and 49.61.

The observation point is located to the right of l' Ajuntament De Montblanc,[71] while the observation direction points South-East. On the right is the building that from the 17th century became known as Cal Malet, shown in Figures 49.60 and 49.61, and still bears that name. To the left is the tower of the Saint Michael's church of Montblanc, shown in Figure 49.62. In between, the Casal dels Desclergue (Casa Desclergues) palace is recognizable. Trees still grow on the square and are used for cooling during the hot Spanish summers. Indeed, some things never change. An impression during a festival of the Giants of Montblanc is shown in Figure 49.63.

Consequently, we investigate a close-up. The dress of Mary was initially Spanish Green with a golden motif, which is the style found in the School of Gregorio Fernández in 17th century Spain, and the use of Spanish green color was also widespread in the works of Francisco de Zurbarán, who was operational in Madrid around 1640. In particular, Zurbarán painted saints, to whom he gave a persuasive look in their faces and body language, which is somewhat of the female figure's style in the Montblanc panel. A fair comparison is that of his painting of Santa Eufemia.

When we compare the windows on the 3rd floor of the Casal dels Desclergue on the Montblanc panel with the ones found nowadays, the old ones appear rectangular and more straightforward than the current ones. The Montblanc panel from around 1640 is likely accurate. It is known that Montblanc has suffered several devastating fires, including 'the great fire of 1652.' Restoration has resulted in refined windows. We can illustrate this with a particular example shown in Figures 49.64, 49.65 and 49.66.

49.4.3 An Infrared Study of the Polychromes, including the Montblanc Panel

Although the experiments were performed by simple means;[72] new information was obtained. The procedure is to heat a wall gently (a few degrees Celsius) and then cool it to ambient temperature.[73]

During the cooling, photos are taken with a heat camera (infrared camera).[74] Structural variations of the wall, or the layers covering the wall, can, in principle, be visualized in this way. The requirement is that they exhibit differences in thermal properties. For example, pure wood will absorb and release heat at a different speed than stone so that, during the process, the temperature of the two materials will be slightly different and observable with a heat camera.

The results are presented in Figures 49.67, 49.68, 49.69, 49.70, 49.72, 49.73, 49.74 and 49.75.

In Chapter 49.13.1, more infrared experiments are shown that reveal the chapel's original architecture.

49.4.3.1 Alcoves

The infrared images show that the reliefs were placed in alcoves cut out as rectangular shapes with straight or rounded corners from an existing and plastered wall. The remaining space between the panel and the alcove edges was then filled with new plaster, which reacted slightly differently to infrared rays than the surrounding original application.

49.4.3.2 Original Details of the Montblanc Panel

The results are shown in Figures 49.67, 49.68, 49.69, 49.70, 49.71, 49.72 and 49.74.

49.4.3.3 The Panel with an Inscription Added Later

Evidence that the panels have been recycled to become the seven sorrows of Mary is provided in Figure 49.75, revealing the entirely different nature of this panel compared to the others. A sculptor has produced this panel excellently, similar to the originals, but infrared reveals the difference.

[72] On Friday, February 28, 2020, experiments were conducted, using an infrared camera with a temperature resolution of 50 mK, in the chapel Kapelter-Ruste and the church of Saint Columba, with an infrared source and an infrared camera. The experiment occurred in the presence of Priest Marc Messiaen, Luc Beke, Frans Declercq, Marc Vergote, Antoon Vanhoutte, and Lambert Declercq.

49.4.3.4 Vegetation Seen on the Flight from Egypt panel

The Flight from Egypt panel, shown in Figure 49.76, depicts vegetation connected to Mexico at the time of the chapel's construction. Indeed, it concerns the Mexican Yucca on the one hand and Dracaena Americana on the other.

Like wheat in Spain, Yucca or Cassava was the primary food among Caribbean cultures and is prevalent in Mexico, conquered by Hernán Cortés. The first Spanish settlers placed little interest in this plant, in contrast to the Indians of the Caribbean, who had cassava as a basis for their diet and many other uses. They extracted materials for constructing their housing, needles, ropes, drinks, and medicines. Since the 16th century, the Spanish exported the plant to Cuba and Spain. What is eaten is the root, similar to manioc or potatoes.

The panel, a depiction of a well-known biblical scene, also holds a personal connection to Antoni Desclergue. It references a significant event in his early life when his mother, along with her brother and child, fled from Spain to Flanders in 1602. This event is detailed in Chapter 29.5.26 and Chapter 34.4, adding a personal and historical layer to the panel's interpretation.

49.4.3.5 The Original Retable Fabricated with 17th-century Spanish Techniques and later Recycled to the Seven Sorrows of Mary

49.4.3.5.1 Applied Fabrication Technique Two examples of refined Spanish Baroque sculptures for comparison, with comparative color pallets, are shown in Figures 49.77 and 49.78.

As is common in Spain, the original retable must have been built of several panels representing Saints and Biblical events. As described in Chapter 49.13.4, the original retable has been replaced by a new one.

The reliefs were re-used to form the seven Sorrows of Mary in the chapel's interior walls in 1884. Before, they must have been stored elsewhere and were most probably part of the chapel of Onze Lieve Vrouw Ter Ruste inside the Columba church after one had removed them from the Chapel of Deerlijk during the French period. The remaining panels are described in Chapter 49.4.3.5.3 and shown in Figure 49.84 on page 1016. They are numbered from 1 to 7. There were likely more panels, but one probably destroyed them as they did not fit their new purpose to represent the seven sorrows. The installation of the panels cost 1200 Franks, which was half the price of constructing a little tower on the chapel's roof.

The panels are of a similar artistic quality as retables in Spain from the first half of the 17th century. For instance, the Retablo de Nuestra Señora del Rosario at Calamoch in the province of Teruel is one such example, made by Pedro Martínez, Domingo Martínez, and Jaime Viñola in 1606 and Melchor Luzón made some alterations in 1646; the style of the retable at Calamocha is that of Pedro Belsue and Francisco Lacosta.

About Panel 2 of the flight to Egypt in Figure 49.67, the moon's appearance on the panel is rare. For instance, we may cite Adam Elsheimer here, born in Frankfurt in 1578 but had his career in Italy and died there in Rome in 1610. In his painting of the flight to Egypt, a moon is visible. In a later period, 1640, we also find a moon on Rembrandt's version of the flight to Egypt.[75]

We studied the technique used to fabricate the panels. We investigated the clumsy restoration that had taken place in the past when they changed function from Retabel reliefs to Panels describing Mary's seven sorrows, and maybe later, too.

They are wooden sculptures in panels that must have been part of the chapel's original retable. The panels were covered by gesso[76] (an underground layer covering the wood substrate), which is textured[77] on a flat background, shown in Figure 49.79, 49.80, 49.81 and 49.82.

This technique of texturing was widespread in Spain in the 16th century. The Gesso is covered by a red layer of assiette 'a dorer,[78] as shown in Figure 49.80.

On top of the red layer is a gilded[79] layer of gold paint.

The above description also applies to, for instance, the Retablo de la Orden de Santiago[80] at Iglesia Parroquial de la Virgen de los Remedios, Estremera in Madrid, constructed around 1530.

An introduction to such techniques can be found in the work of Eva López et al.[81].

A repetitive square-like pattern was typical for that time and was probably used to let the gold shine omnidirectional. On the panel with text, at Deerlijk, no such gesso layer is applied, confirming that the 'panel zero' does not belong to the original set and must have been added in 1884.

49.4.3.5.2 Narrative of the Retable In the current configuration of panels in the chapel, the Montblanc panel presumably depicts Mary and Joseph. They have lost Jesus in the temple at the age of 12. The relief serves as one image out of seven, representing the sorrows of Mary. A Mary-like personage and a male personage are there, and buildings suit this purpose.

Still, several issues clearly show that this was, initially, neither Mary nor Joseph. Priest Michiel Declercq, shown in Figure 49.95 on page 1023, of the parish of Saint Columba in Deerlijk, once described the chapel's interior in Deerlijk during the baptism of the author's youngest son Lambert. He explained that there used to be an animal on that particular panel, as in Figure 49.83 a long time ago, and that this has been removed because it was ugly and because one would never expect Joseph to have an animal on a leash. We know that Saint Rochus often has a dog with him, but never a lion; he also never has a script in his hand and typically has a shell of Saint-Jaques and other apparent pilgrimage symbols, but never a book. Several images are shown at the beginning of Chapter 29. Unlike Saint Rochus (Saint Roch or Sant Rocco), Saint Jeroni is never depicted as a pilgrim on his way to Santiago de Compostela (wearing a shell) because the pilgrimage to Santiago de Compostela has existed only since 814. At the same time, Saint Hieronymus of Stridon died in 420.

The sculpture has been overpainted several times. The figure of Sant Jeroni has been transformed, mainly by removing the lion figure. Still, even under these circumstances, it does not yet resemble Joseph as we usually find him in models.

[75] Rembrandt's version of the flight to Egypt is by experts sometimes attributed to Ferdinand Bol.

[76] Gesso is a white paint mixture consisting of a binder mixed with chalk, gypsum, or pigment. It is used as an underlayer on wooden panels to create a smooth surface for painting or Gilding.

[77] Textured Gesso: In the 16th century, particularly in Spain, Gesso was often textured to add a decorative element. This texture could be achieved through various techniques such as stamping, carving, or pressing patterns into the wet Gesso. The texture would create a subtle relief that would enhance the appearance of the Gilding applied on top.

[78] Assiette is a term used in Gilding that refers to the base layer applied before the gold leaf. Typically, this layer is red or reddish-brown and is made from a mixture of clay (bole) and a binder. The color of the assiette affects the tone and brilliance of the gold leaf applied over it.

[79] Gilding is the process of applying gold leaf or gold paint to a surface. Since ancient times, this technique has been used to add a luxurious finish to artworks, architecture, and decorative objects.

[80] Retablo de la Orden de Santiago: As mentioned, this retable located in the Iglesia Parroquial de la Virgen de los Remedios in Estremera, Madrid, constructed around 1530, serves as a prominent example of these techniques. The repetitive square-like pattern used in the gesso texturing would catch light in different directions, enhancing the brilliance of the gold.

The seven panels at Deerlijk intend to represent Mary's seven sorrows, but a church is visible in the picture, while churches, of course, appear only centuries later.

An oil painting shows Joseph wearing a hat, Huida a Egipto by Antonio Pradales (1618-1685), currently stored at the Arts Institute of Detroit in Michigan, USA. So, a hat is possible for Joseph. However, the scene in Deerlijk does not represent Egypt's flight as the panel next to it does. Also, generally, in paintings representing the flight to Egypt, there is a donkey visible, and Jesus is, of course, also depicted.

Note that sometimes Santiago is also shown wearing a sombrero. Still, Santiago is recognizable by other attributes, such as a shell or a water bottle, which are not visible on the Montblanc panel. The only location where a bottle or shell might have appeared would be at the bottom of the stick, where it has been broken. Nevertheless, this would be weird: we have not found a single depiction of Santiago holding a bottle or shell close to the ground at the lower end of the stick.

We may safely assume that the depicted male figure is that of Sant Jeroni.

49.4.3.5.3 The Retable in its Current Role as Seven Sorrows The buildings are typically Spanish and show Gothic features. They can still be found in Montblanc, Tarragona, and Barcelona. The Gothic period appeared much later than the 1st century AD. The appearance of a church contradicts the modern use of the Seven Sighs of Mary because there were no churches in her life.

The archives at Deerlijk reveal that the seven sorrows' images were (re) installed in the chapel in 1884. As mentioned above, their installation cost 1200 Franks. It is then that a new altar has been constructed in the chapel, which replaced the original retable. In contrast, the original retable parts had been stored (perhaps in a temporary chapel inside the Columba Church of Deerlijk). They received their new destination in the chapel in 1884.

The course of time must have impacted the appearance of the retable.

Besides, the chapel served different purposes during its lifetime, including a school and a hospital. The intact remains of the retable have been refurbished to help a new mission: depicting the seven sorrows of Mary. Why? Well, devotion to Mary became a significant trend again in Flanders after 1854.

Figure 49.84 shows the seven panels in the Chapel of Deerlijk, constituting the chapel's seven sorrows, together with a panel that displays a gothic inscription. Although one has tried to make the latter fit into the series of 7 reliefs, when they appear together, the differences are striking. The seven sorrows are as follows:

The Prophecy of Simeon.
The escape and Flight into Egypt.
The Loss of the Child Jesus in the Temple of Jerusalem.
The Meeting of Mary and Jesus on the Via Dolorosa.
The Crucifixion of Jesus on Mount Calvary.
The Piercing of the Side of Jesus with a spear, and His Descent from the Cross.
The Burial of Jesus by Joseph of Arimathea.

Panel zero shows a text in Gothic letters: 'De VII Weedommen van Maria' (The seven sorrows of Mary). The board is different from the others and is probably fabricated in a somewhat industrialized manner.

Whoever made it did his best to appear as if the text was written in 1639 when the chapel was established. We have discovered that the characters were copied from Herman Pieterszoon, Leersnijder, at Delft in 1508. The distinctive letter M has equally been used to ornament the dress of the Mary of Sorrows' colossal statue, adorning the chapel since 1884.

Note that, to transform the scene on the Main Square of Montblanc (relief 3) into something that may portray Joseph and Mary searching for their lost son Jesus in the temple, the lion, typical for Sant Jeroni, has been removed as described before to make Jeroni look more like Joseph even though the buildings on the scene are gothic.

There is a church in the back, which is anachronistic, given that early churches date from after 200 AD. The author knows only two examples of a church being shown in a biblical scene: Hans Memling's Last Judgment (1467-1471), which refers to a distant future, and Pieter Bruegel the Elder's Census at Bethlehem (1566), which explicitly invokes an anachronism to show a snowy Flemish contemporary landscape and to complain about the modern bureaucracy.

In other words, the church shown on the panel in Deerlijk appears on purpose to represent Montblanc.

49.5 Narrative of the Miracle and Antoni Desclergue's Role in 1634

49.5.1 Introduction

The wonder, described in Chapter 49.12 and the recorded facts presented here offer significant similarities with one in Montblanc, described in Chapter 49.6.

There have been several versions of the 1634 miracle. The original testimonies were discovered by the team of Bruggeman[82] in the Arras archives[83] in France and date from 1639.

To this book's author, there is no doubt that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his wife Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) witnessed the miracle of 1634 at Deerlijk. The induction is based on the legend that a Knight or Nobleman was involved, on the fact that Antoni knew all the known witnesses personally, and that the Bishop, who knew Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his father Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), refused to sign the record with the witnesses because we presume, he knew it was not (yet) completed. He needed Antoni's statements on this matter to be included before his validation.

In addition, the oldest known depiction of the miracle refers to Jeroni Desclergue, explained in Chapter 49.10.4, bares Antoni Desclergue's signature, as shown in Figure 49.2 on page 978, and depicts la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc in the tree, as seen in Figure 49.1 on page 977.

The witnesses were recorded in 1639 while Antoni was in Spain. The written testimonies belong to the Du Bois archives, not the ecclesiastic ones at Tournai; they were never sealed nor signed by the Bishop, and there are no indications of completeness[84]. It's striking that, apart from a short statement by the local priest, none of the other clerics or men in power at Deerlijk or Harelbeke has made any preserved declaration.

[84] Although it's unlikely that the recorded testimonies would be false, their preservation must have resulted from selective archiving by the family, while they may have destroyed disadvantageous documents.

In Chapter 49.2.2.2, we highlighted Bishop Maximilien II Villain de Gand and his connection with Antoni Desclergue (DC06). We also saw that he was a pious person and a man of principle.

In particular, in the year of the miracle at Deerlijk, he wrote the manuscript 'Speculum sacerdotum.' In other words, in 1634, he highlighted priests' moral duty and conscience, which must have contributed to his stubborn refusal to sign the document in 1639. Indeed, although the family Du Bois-Kelduwier insisted on having the report approved and moving forward with establishing the chapel that they sponsored and tried to obtain benefits from, the Bishop could not sign it because it was not complete; Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) testimony and that of others were missing. Consequently, a completed document must have followed and awaits discovery or is lost in time.

When the witnesses were recorded in November 1639, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) had yet to return from Spain with the statuette of Cano and the retable containing the scene of the Plaza Mayor of Montblanc. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his wife Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) must have been essential witnesses of the event, reflected in the legend that survived and was written down in the 18th century.

They, and nobody else, were the Knight or Nobleman and his wife, central in the tale.

49.5.2 Antoni Desclergue (DC06) in 1634

The year 1634 has been critical to the Desclergues. Indeed, that year, Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) uncle in Montblanc, Francesc Desclergue (DC05e) received a nobility title, as described in Chapter 28.5.6 and shown in the document of Figure 28.23, on page 358. Bringing back a handcrafted retable from Montblanc during his visit in 1639 should have received full support from his family. 1634 was an annus mirabilis and assured the family that the coincidental miracle in Deerlijk was not haphazardly. Support to credit Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) must have been natural.

In 1634, on June 30, Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) uncle Antoni (DC05b) died in Ghent, as shown in Figure 32.20 on page 498. It was equally the year when Carlos Coloma de Saa, a friend of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and the person who had recruited Antoni Desclergue (DC06), returned to Spain.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was not absent on the list of la bourgeoisie foraine of Kortrijk in 1634, shown in Figure 34.177 on page 589.

On July 11, 1634, Joan (DC07c), son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), was baptized at Deerlijk in Figure 36.10 on page 642. He may have been in a precarious condition just after his birth, whence his father Antoni (DC06) promised to construct a chapel in Deerlijk should he recover. Then, when the miracle happened a few weeks later, in August, Antoni remembered his promise. As a few years went by, he decided to devote the chapel to his parents and found financial support in the person of Marguerite Kelduwier, the wealthy widow of Jean Du Bois.

49.5.3 The Miracle Pointed at la Mare de Déu de la Serra

From Bruggeman's article, we translated the existing legend concerning the chapel:[85]

> In great distress, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) took refuge in la Mare de Déu de la Serra and promised to fall the giant tree in the forest to build a chapel in her honor on Asschendries. His prayer was answered, and his son was healed, but he forgot the promise. When the tree was felled and transported along the Asschendries, horses and wagons could no longer go on. The Catalan Knight sawed the tree, and he found a small statue of Our Lady in it. The event reminded him of his promise, after which a chapel was erected.

The reader familiar with Catalan will recognize 'la serra,' which is 'a saw' in English, applied to cut trees and saw wood, but equally used to describe 'a mountain range.' The pun, along with the tree cutting in the legend, were references to La Mare de Déu de la Serra.

Interestingly, Bruggeman states that[86]

'Is the legend nothing but the fruit of the imagination of a pious population? There is a grain of truth in all legends and that truth would give our local fraternity of historians the opportunity to discover!'

49.5.4 Details of the 1634 Miracle

49.5.4.1 The Recorded Facts

The miracle in 1634 is the religious foundation of the chapel in Deerlijk. It was discovered in 2003 by Albert Bruggeman[87] and his colleagues of Heemkring Dorp en Toren of Deerlijk. The discovered files come from a private archive, not the official ecclesiastic of the Diocese of Tournai, and they are probably incomplete.

None of the documents contains the seal or signature of the Bishop.

In the 18th century, one mixed the memory of this miracle with new facts. It resulted in a legend about the chapel in which a Nobleman called de Cassina was involved. Still, the chapel is a century older than the Cassina family's appearance in Deerlijk.

Bruggeman's article re-established that 'De Cassina' had nothing to do with the chapel because this family only appeared in Deerlijk in the 18th century.

Colleagues of Heemkring Dorp en Toren have done investigations at Les Archives Départementales de Arras in Northern France. They found seven written testimonies concerning the chapel's legend in the private Du Bois archives. We summarise the testimonials below.

The main witness was Judocus Bulckaert (JB), husband of Jeanne Cloet and son of Pierre. He was a carpenter from Kortrijk who had bought an oak tree in Deerlijk.

[85] We have replaced the words 'Adriaan de Cassina, heer van Deerlijk,' by 'Antoni Desclergue.' Note that both names have AD as an acronym. We equally replaced 'kasteelheer' with 'Catalaanse ridder' to smoothen the line of thought. We also replaced 'Onze-Lieve-Vrouw' by 'Onze-Lieve-Vrouw van de zaag' and translated to 'la Mare de Déu de la Serra' to specify our Lady congruent our argument.
According to Bruggeman, the story was copied from Leon Defraeye, 'Geschiedenis en Folklore van Deerlijk,' of 1942, which referred to an article in 'Biekorf' in 1891

[87] Albert Bruggeman, 'The legend of O.-L-Vrouw ter Ruste,' Derlike, 26th volume, Jul-Aug-Sept 2003.

The other witnesses were Valentin Bekaert (VB)[88][89][90] from Deerlijk, Marcus Van Marcke (MVM)[91][92], Guillaume Vermandere (GV)[93] from Kortrijk, Pieter Wielandt (PW)[94][95] from Deerlijk, pastor Zacharius Waultier (SW)[96] from Deerlijk and finally, and the Bishop of Tournai, Maximilien II Villain de Gand, described in Chapter 49.2.2.2.

The testimonies date from the end of 1639, just after the chapel was built.

We noted November 2 (MVM) and November 3 (PW) in 1639.

The testimonies were recorded by the Hispanic theologian Matheo de Morgues of Portuguese origin.

Links between Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and the different witnesses of the miracle of 1634 are shown in Chapter 34.5.13, including the Kelduwier and Montens families.

The witnesses are the carpenter and the people who helped him that day. Besides, the pastor is heard, and the Bishop of Tournai decides.

The official document expressing the Bishop's approval has never been found, but the Du Bois family claims in later papers that it occurred on November 23, 1639. Since Antoni Desclergue returned from Spain in 1640, we assume his testimony should have been recorded before his departure in 1639. It is improbable that a Bishop would have approved the miracle in nearly three weeks, based on seven ordinary witnesses, without hearing any person of higher rank.

We defined the initials in the above paragraphs and summarised the information provided by the seven testimonies in the following.

The story is about a carpenter from Kortrijk who bought an oak tree (JB, VB, GV) from the Assche court ('Asschendries') in Deerlijk (JB, VB, GV). During transport, the horses suddenly could no longer pull the cart, which was abnormal.

All witnesses agree that the merchant was Judocus Bulckaert (JB, VB, MVM, GV, PW). The latter added a few more details: the tree cost seven pounds and had about 180 bundles of branches (JB). He also remembered that the incident occurred at the end of August 1634, four months after purchasing the tree (JB). The other witnesses remember it was about five years before their testimony (MVM, GV, PW). So far, everything is clear and reasonable.

The witnesses disagree or no longer know about the other facts.

About the distance from the tree's original location to where the miracle happened, JB claims it is 400-500 steps, while PW claims it is 400-500 feet[97]. According to JB, his alleged distance concerns the number of footsteps measured from de Vierschaar van Assche.

The other witnesses claim that the incident occurred where 'now' (i.e., late 1639) the chapel stands (VB, MVM), while GV only claims it is where a statue of Mary hung from a tree. PW clearly states that it happened where Mary's statue hung from an oak and where 'now' (so, at the end of 1639), the chapel was built.

GV claims that four horses usually pull such a tree trunk on a cart without any problems. The witnesses agree that not four but five horses were used to drag the cart (JB, VB, MVM, GV, PW).

There is a complete disagreement about the number of people who helped: more than twelve (VB), sixteen (MVM), more than twenty (JB), and many (PW).

Two extra horses were delivered (JB, VB, MVM, GV, PW) by a certain Nicolas or Clays Montens[98][99][100][101][102] (JB, MVM, GV, PW).

According to JB and MVM, the spectators interpreted the incident as a wish of the Virgin Mary's statue to be presented with a shelter. The latter would need to be constructed from the timber of the transported oak trunk. Only JB adds 'who' had to do that, namely 'someone.'

Pastor SW said that he had heard from a sixty-year-old parishioner, Vincent de Cruce, that the Virgin Mary statue had been hanging on the tree for about twenty years and that there had been another one before.

The Bishop then added that he gave indulgences of forty days to the faithful who prayed the following: 'Pater Noster,' or, 'Ave Maria,' or, 'Ave Maris Stella,' or, 'O Glorioso Domina,' or, 'Salve Regina.'

49.5.4.2 This Author's Reflections on the Testimonies

It is unequivocal that the chapel was constructed by November 1639, albeit yet to be functional, due to the pending official establishment.

Consequently, Antoni Desclergue likely observed the completed structure before his departure to Spain, enabling him to accurately determine the religious ornamentation required for its embellishment.

Given the longstanding presence of the previous statuette, which had been suspended in the tree for approximately two decades, and considering the existence of an even earlier one, the residents of Deerlijk did not exhibit a strong attachment to the statue. Consequently, they would have been amenable to its replacement in 1639 with Cano's work.

Furthermore, it is probable that Catholic Flanders was replete with statues of Mary, indicating a cultural context where such replacements would not be unusual.

Still, a later depiction of the event shows that it concerned a statue of La Mare de Déu de la Serra of Montblanc, shown in Figure 49.1 on page 977.

The chapel's construction in Deerlijk in 1639 had been planned for at least five years.

According to his testimony to the Portuguese cleric Matheo de Morgues, Pastor Zacharius Wautier (SW) is the sole credible source in this matter.

This brief testimony, written in Latin, reveals that Wautier learned from a 60-year-old parishioner, Vincent van Cruce, that the statue had been hanging on the tree for approximately 20 years. However, the pastor refrains from commenting on the events, leading to suspicions that the witnesses may have fabricated parts of the story or that the pastor himself was inadequately informed.

[97] The stated numerical value for the distance was 400 to 500 feet or steps and was precisely the same for every witness. Altogether, it concerns 900, so 'CM' in Roman numerals, again symbolism for the complete family name of Antoni (DC06), namely 'desClergue y de Montoya,' a curiosity.

As mentioned above, the fact that the tree was sawn pointed, in the story, at 'la serra' and therefore revealed that it concerned La Mare de Déu de la Serra of Montblanc.

The contradictory testimonies concerning the distance between the location where the oak tree was felled and the chapel's site are especially dubious. During that period, craftsmen were undoubtedly familiar with the distinction between a foot and a step, 'un pie y un paso.' A step was approximately five times the length of a foot, making it highly improbable that such measurements could be erroneously conflated in a professional testimony given in good faith.

We know that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) wanted a chapel built in honor of his father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), and possibly his mother, Felipa de Montoya; he must have supported Marguerite Kelduwier in this regard, who also wanted a chapel.

Ecclesiastical endorsement for establishing a chapel is more readily secured when a miraculous event is associated. It is plausible to surmise that in August 1634, an incident involving a cart laden with a tree trunk becoming immobilized occurred, reminiscent of the legend of La Mare de Déu de la Serra of Montblanc. This could have been perceived as a miraculous event or ascribed to a mechanical failure, such as a defective wheel or axle. The individuals at the scene likely believed, with genuine conviction, that they were witnessing a miracle. While the occurrence may have had supernatural undertones, discrepancies exist among witness reports regarding the number of onlookers present.

Nevertheless, considering the broader context in this volume, it is reasonable to infer that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his spouse, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), were among the witnesses. The event likely transpired in the vicinity of the current chapel or nearby. A statue of Mary was reportedly affixed to a tree at the site, aligning with the narrative of La Mare de Déu de la Serra of Montblanc. The precise location was likely of minimal significance because, in Catholic Flanders, figurines of the Virgin Mary were ubiquitous, particularly at crossroads and alley entrances. The statuette mentioned in the narrative cannot be the one currently housed in the chapel, as it remains remarkably well-preserved, showing no signs of weathering or damage, indicating it must have been stored in a sheltered environment for nearly four centuries. A statue exposed to the elements in a tree for twenty years would undoubtedly exhibit wear and deterioration. Therefore, it is highly probable that the present statue was brought from Madrid by Antoni Desclergue in 1639 (DC06).

It is entirely plausible that both Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and the Bishop linked the event in Deerlijk to Her Royal Highness Isabella of Spain, given the symbolic involvement of a tree. However, the reference to a saw indicates La Mare de Déu de la Serra of Montblanc. Furthermore, the earliest depiction explicitly illustrates that the event was indeed associated with the patron saint of Montblanc.

On December 1, 1633, Her Royal Highness Isabella of Spain, whose life and deeds are elaborated upon in Chapter 8.8.3, passed away in Brussels approximately one year before the Miracle at Deerlijk.

This raises the question: was Isabella communicating something through this miraculous event? This occurrence undoubtedly contributed to the Bishop's understanding of the matter. Isabella was the consort of His Royal Highness Albert of Austria. Together, they were celebrated for their triumph in the Battle of Ostend, a conflict in September 1604 where the Spanish Netherlands emerged victorious against the Dutch States and the English. Notably, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), the father of Antoni and a figure described in Chapter 29.5.28, was killed during this battle.

The Spanish attributed their victory at Ostend to the intercession of the Virgin Mary of Scherpenheuvel, a statue discovered in an oak tree. In 1605, in gratitude for this victory, Isabella and Albert commissioned the construction of a basilica in the pilgrimage town of Scherpenheuvel. Following this, Ambrogio Spinola secured a series of victories against the Dutch States, which the Spaniards also credited to the divine favor associated with Scherpenheuvel.

Significantly, the Bishop gave indulgence for the following prayers:

'Pater Noster,' a symbolic link to Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), father of Antoni Desclergue (DC06);

'Ave Maria,' a symbolic link to Felipa de Montoya, mother of Antoni Desclergue (DC06);

'Ave Maris Stella,' a symbolic link to the SuperNova seen in the sky at the end of the battle for Ostend in 1604 and considered a divine sign;

'O glorioso Domina' and 'Salve Regina,' almost direct references to Isabella of Spain.

The person who provided the two extra horses was a certain Nicolas Montens, while one witness remembered him as Clays Montens. As stated above, he is likely a relative of Marguerite Kelduwier but is also associated with Antoni Desclergue.

' Vincent de Cruce' is the sixty-year-old villager mentioned by the pastor. It means that this witness was born in 1579 when the Spanish liberated Kortrijk from the Calvinists. If this was a fictitious person, it's important to remember that his full name means 'the Victory of Christ.'[103]

In August 1634, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his contemporaries interpreted the Miracle as a sign of divine protection. This perception can be contextualized by the arrival of Ferdinand of Austria, brother to King Philip IV of Spain, who had arrived from Milan with a substantial military force the preceding month. This army was deployed to safeguard the Southern Netherlands from the States and the French. Consequently, Ferdinand's presence engendered a sense of security and relative peace. In this context, it became necessary to erect the chapel 'Ten Ruste' as a tangible expression of this newfound stability and protection.

The merchant acquired an oak tree for seven pounds. The tree's dimensions dimensions were such that it could yield 180 bundles of branches. Within the narrative, two oak trees are featured, symbolically resulting in 360 branches. It is noteworthy that Jeroni Desclergue passed away in Ostend precisely 360 months before the Miracle in Deerlijk.

49.5.4.3 Official Endorsement of the 1634 Miracle and further Contestation of the Chaplaincy until Antoni Desclergue died in 1690

Subsequent documents authored by the descendants of Du Bois assert that the miracle received official recognition on November 23, 1639.

However, no archival record contains a document signed by the Bishop to substantiate this claim. This either indicates that the information needs to be more accurate or that the archives need to be completed. The benefice was formally approved on June 18, 1641, coinciding with the year following Antoni's return from Spain.

The Chaplaincy, which represented the status that would ultimately confer the desired power upon the Du Bois family, remained contested until 1690. This year marks the death of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), suggesting that he opposed the Chaplaincy until his demise.

[103] Vincent de Cruce may have been symbolically appropriated as a conceptual witness, despite the existence of an actual individual by that name. Within the realms of faith and the esoteric associations with miracles and the Knights Templar, symbolic representations frequently hold greater significance than empirical facts.

49.6 Similarities with the Legend of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc

We present the patron of Montblanc, the Virgin of the Serra, in Figure 49.1 on page 977.

We conclude that the miraculous event detailed in Chapter 49.5 likely occurred before a replica of this figurine, which was suspended in a tree in Deerlijk in the year 1634. Notably, the phenomenon in Deerlijk exhibits remarkable similarities to the one associated with la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc, as depicted in Figure 49.85.

The contents of this section mainly come from Albert Oliva's article, described in Figure 49.85, with the necessary information added in this book's context. The image of the Virgin of the Sierra, a large Italian Gothic alabaster sculpture, has been revered for centuries. Its history, shrouded in one of the most enigmatic and amazing legends in the region [104], holds a significant place in religious history. It shows essential similarities with the miracle in Deerlijk, described in Chapter 49.5.4. The carving of the Virgin of the Serra is located in a chamber behind the main altar of the sanctuary, shown in Figure 49.86, of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc, and is accessed by stairs built on the sides. Probably from the 13th century, the image depicts the life-size Virgin Mary with the child Jesus in her arms. It is 1.75 m high and weighs 371 kg. Four personages of biblical women guard it throughout the year, Rachel, Esther, Rebekah, and Judith.

The legend pertains to a Greek princess who transported the sacred image to Montblanc. According to tradition, Princess Irene of Lascaris carried an image of the Virgin Mary from Salou to Zaragoza. During their journey through Montblanc, the oxen pulling the carriage halted and refused to proceed, interpreted as a divine sign of the Virgin's desire to remain at that location. This site was notably marked by a Green Cross, now housed within the sanctuary, signifying the place where Saracens were said to have martyred five Christian children.

Princess Irene subsequently sought permission from King James II to construct a convent for the Poor Clare nuns on that hill, utilizing stones from the recently demolished synagogue in Montblanc's Jewish Quarter. The construction of the new sanctuary, intended to house the Holy Image, commenced in 1296. Historical records indicate that it became the second most frequented sanctuary in Catalonia, following Montserrat, and it received numerous privileges from Popes and monarchs during the fifteenth century.

Throughout history, like many other significant monuments and buildings, it has endured the ravages of wars and looting. Nevertheless, the veneration and upkeep of the sanctuary have persisted to the present day. The Greek princess was notably relentless in bringing the Virgin Mary to Zaragoza.

As per oral tradition, she amputated a finger from the image and transported it to her destination city, as the image itself had resolved to remain in Montblanc.

Upon examining the Virgin of the Sierra, one can observe that a finger from her right hand is conspicuously missing, with evidence suggesting it was meticulously removed. The exact timing of this event and the current whereabouts of the finger remain unknown. Legend holds that, in some manner, the finger eventually reached Zaragoza.

49.7 Children Concerned in Montblanc and Deerlijk

About the place of prayer Onze-Lieve-Vrouw-ter-Rustekapel, it is known that mothers often visited the chapel with their children and that the holy patron goddess was worshiped there against the crying of the children to obtain peace of mind.[105] We know from the place of prayer El monestir i la Mare de Deu de la Serra de Montblanc that in the monastery of the Serra in Montblanc, a green cross and a polychrome statue of the Virgin of the Serra are central.

The legend about the origin of the place where the oxen stopped occurred where a green cross (la creu verdá) was on the hill. According to the story, that cross, shown in Figure 49.87, was placed there in memory of five Christian children who were tortured to death by the Saracens. [106] [107] [108] [109] [110] [111] [112] [113] [114] [115] [116] [[117]

Many miracles are attributed to the pilgrimage site of El monestir i la Mare de Deu de la Serra de Montblanc, many related to children, such as the story that a deceased child was brought back to life.

49.8 Paranormal Events in Deerlijk and Montblanc

Besides miracles related to children, several others are attributed to the monastery of la Mare de Deu de la Serra in Montblanc, shown in Figure 49.88, such as halos above the monastery and flashes of light in and above the sanctuary.

Other paranormal events were also recorded there, such as the inexplicable lighting of a candle and other ghostly occurrences and miracles.[119]

SN1604. Spaniards from Montblanc saw a connection with their home city.

The appearance of flashes of light is also a story that has long lived among the population in Deerlijk. Leon Defraeye wrote some testimonials, such as: "The chapel was haunted, and in the evening, people saw the light in the chapel and heard looms working."[120]

The legitimacy of paranormal phenomena can be debated; however, observing and recounting such experiences may be influenced by a tradition where narratives from Montblanc intertwine with those concerning the chapel in Deerlijk. Those anticipating manifestations, such as light flashes, within these stories might perceive them as genuine.

La Cru Verdà is now located inside the Sanctuary and Monastery of la Serra in Montblanc, and it is shown in Figure 49.87.

49.9 Marguerite Kelduwier as the chapel's proprietary

49.9.1 À propos on Marguerite Kelduwier

The author initially underestimated the role of Marguerite Kelduwier due to a lack of documents and references.[121]

With Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) appearance in Deerlijk and his involvement in establishing a chapel, local historians can now consider their research from a Spanish perspective, potentially uncovering more facts. It is time to explore the surviving Spanish archives and collaborate with Iberian local and global historians. Much remains to be discovered about Deerlijk's Spanish period and that of the nearby places such as Harelbeke and Kortrijk.

Antoni Desclergue, a witness to the miracle of 1634, aimed to honor his parents by establishing a chapel. In contrast, Marguerite Kelduwier, with local roots and financial means, sought to elevate her power and that of her descendants by establishing a chapel with benefice and a chaplaincy.

Antoni used Marguerite for her finances, while Marguerite used Antoni for his connections within the Spanish regime, linking the initiative to the Spanish victory at Ostend in 1604 and the artwork described in Chapters 49.3 and 49.4.

As detailed and shown in Figure 49.1 on page 977, the miracle occurred before a figurine of La Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc in Deerlijk, originating from the Desclergues' hometown, Montblanc in Tarragona.

Ultimately, as the owner, Marguerite is remembered through official documents, while Antoni's memory became legendary, later transformed into a myth, with the person of de Cassina replacing his name.

The thought of Spanish influence in the chapel's erection might be controversial to locals, but the evidence presented in this book is undeniable. The aim is to honor our ancestors by revealing the truth.

As a patrilineal descendant of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), the author defends his case and revives Antoni's memory. Marguerite Kelduwier's role and her past in Deerlijk are well known, carefully studied, and further investigated by the Benoit family, including Filip Benoit and Karl Uyttenhove, and others of the Historical Fraternity of Dorp en Toren in Deerlijk. The author does not contest their work; after all, Marguerite owned the chapel, and her descendants were in charge.

Nevertheless, the initiation, the miracle, the art from Spain, and the desire to honor his parents were Antoni's work. The miracle, occurring in front of a souvenir from Montblanc, likely brought by Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), cannot be denied. Disregarding these facts constitutes a profound violation of scholarly integrity.

According to the society Stichting Behoud van Oud, the family name Kelduwier derives from the old French 'cueillerie,' or harvest, appearing in various forms in France and Flanders.[122] The various forms include: Delcoeuillerie, Delcoeullerie, Delcueillerie, Delceuillerie, Delecoeuillerie, Delecueillerie, Delculerie, Quellerie, Quelleryе, Quelerij, Quellery, Quelderie, Queldry, Heldines, Kelderwiers, Keldewiers, Kuelduis, Keldewier, Kelduwier, Kellewiers, Callewier, Caluwier, Keylewier, Keylewiers, Keilewier, kelkewier, Caluwyer, Keldewyer, Gueldewier, Heldevent, Kelduyier.

Marguerite Kelduwier[123] was the daughter of Antheunis Kelduwier (1538-1578) and Judoca Vanderplancke (deceased in 1579). She appears in several documents, including the Orphan's deed after her father's death (Figure 49.90).

Marguerite, born in Deerlijk, was wealthy and married Jean du Bois[124] from Lille, later becoming his widow. They were wealthy bankers from Lille, with Jean an acquaintance of Jan Declercq (DK03), Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) stepfather, and Jeroni Joan Desclergue's (DC05) friend, as shown in Figure 34.243 on page 605.

Comparing Antoni Desclergue (DC06) with this wealthy family reveals significant differences. In Catalonia, typically, one son inherited everything, while the others made their way through military service or overseas ventures.

Antoni's father and his brothers came to Flanders around 1590, while their brother Francesc stayed in Montblanc, inheriting everything.[125]

Soldiers hoped to gain titles through military performance, earning little but expecting rewards after critical victories and campaigns. Hence, neither Jeroni (DC05) nor Antoni (DC06) were wealthy; they were soldiers engaging in other activities during the winter months. This was typical for a Spanish noble family, where one child, the heir, inherited everything, and the others had to fend for themselves.

Recent documents claim that Bishop Vilain de Gand approved the miracle in Deerlijk on November 23, 1639, though a signed [121] Science is a continuous transition of successive models and theories. Subatomic particles were often predicted theoretically for symmetry reasons before being discovered experimentally. When Urbain Le Verrier predicted, from an abnormal motion of the planet Uranus measured by Alexis Bouvard, on mathematical grounds, assuming that Isaac Newton had correctly formulated the laws of motion in physics, that there must be another hidden planet 'Neptune,' Johann Gottfried Galle and Heinrich Louis d'Arrest looked where the theory predicted it. They observed the new planet on September 24, 1846. The discovery confirmed the assumption that Newton's laws encompassed nothing but the whole truth and explained the motion of planets, stars, and galaxies just as they described the trajectory of a projectile or a falling apple. However, after Albert Einstein emerged with a new paradigm that the time-space curvature determines the motion of objects by the existence of mass and not by a mathematical formula describing an inexplicable force, it was Eddington who, during the solar eclipse on May 29, 1919, observed that the mass deflects light and that time-space is, therefore, curved. Insight is a non-linear process of proposing models and verifying them, as well as deduction through already-made observations. We must allow the functions of human discovery by all means to obtain insight.

[123] Establishing Marguerite Kelduwier's entire ancestry tree remains to be done. Filip Benoit and Karl Uyttenhove will likely focus on this in the coming years, having already made significant progress.

[124] The investigation into the Flemish variant of the name "Du Bois," such as "Van den Bosche," represents a credible avenue for local historians exploring the ancient Flemish or Germanic origins of their village's history. However, it would not be surprising for the author to discover in the future that Jean Du Bois was, in fact, Joan Desbosch, a Catalan banker or someone of Catalan descent.

[125] The grandfather in Montblanc was Bonaventura Desclergue y Cortés (DC04), described in Chapter 28. After two marriages, he had four sons and one daughter: Antoni Desclergue y Ratera, described in Chapter 32, Francesc Desclergue y Ratera, described in Chapter 28.3.1, Francisca Desclergue y Ratera, described in Chapter 28.3.3, Enric Desclergue y Cortés, described in Chapter 33, and Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), described in Chapter 29. Three brothers came to Flanders around 1590, while a fourth brother, Francesc, stayed in Montblanc, where he would inherit everything.

Figure 49.50: This is the holy water tank at the chapel. We don't know if it is the original from 1641, but it looks ancient and is likely made of Tournai bluestone and may have been donated by the Bishop of Tournai, Maximilien II Vilain de Gand. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

The Yucca from Mexico is called 'Nahuatl,' in the Iczotl language of the Aztecs. In Central and South America, the species Dracaena Americana is often called the 'tree of happiness' due to its association with an ancient Aztec myth about a young soldier who had romantic feelings for the daughter of the High Priest. The paternal figure inserted a wooden rod into the soil. It imposed a deadline of five days upon the prospective partner to facilitate the growth of foliage on said rod on the condition that failure to do so would result in the termination of the young gentleman's life. The soldier diligently continued to rinse the piece of the Dragon Tree, resulting in a favorable resolution to the tense circumstance.
The attentive reader with travel experience or adept navigation abilities will see that a vertical crescent shape is not found near the equator, Egypt or Palestine, but manifests in the northernmost regions. In summary, although the casual reader may interpret the panel as depicting the departure from Egypt, a more discerning observer would recognize it as portraying the departure of Felipa de Montoya and her child Antoni from Barcelona to the North in 1602.

document is yet to be discovered. Thus, we cannot confirm its completeness or the Bishop's approval. The only indisputable records are related to finance and ownership, which naturally provide us with the names of Marguerite Kelduwier and her Du Bois descendants.

Marguerite Kelduwier, undoubtedly Catholic and likely supporting the Counter-Reformation, witnessed the terror during the Protestant Ghent republic (1577-1584) before Jeroni Desclergue's arrival. Powerful as Jean du Bois' widow, her son François Lamoral succeeded his father at the Court of Auditors in Lille, while her other son, Walrand du Bois, was a priest.

Establishing a chapel close to Deerlijk's village church required Spanish regime support, which Antoni (DC06) provided. Antoni brought a statue by Cano, an artist at the Spanish King's court, which may have been decisive. The Bishop would not have ignored a miracle before a Catalan statue of Our Lady, regardless of Marguerite's wealth.

The power of Kelduwier's descendants and various foreign regimes in later eras, such as the Austrians and the French, alongside the Cassina family, have impacted Antoni Desclergue's legacy in Deerlijk.

However, the villagers have always remembered the story, as described in Chapter 49.12, of the nobleman who established the chapel and the episode of the horses refusing to move. Antoni's initials on one of the retable panels in the chapel's alcoves and the oldest surviving depiction of the miracle (Figure 49.8 on page 997), showing La Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc, persist. Each recorded witness of the Deerlijk miracle, similar to that of the Mary figurine in Montblanc, was known to Antoni Desclergue (DC06), as outlined in Chapter 49.2.2.3.

As described in Chapter 18.10.1, the Desclergues of Catalonia share a longstanding historical alliance with the Desbosch family, originating with Rénovard Desbosch's companionship with Raymond Clergue in Mallorca. Consequently, the presence of Antoni Desclergue and the widow of Joan Desbosch, or Jean Du Bois, within the context of a chapel is a readily apparent and predictable occurrence, further explored in Chapter 49.9.2.

49.9.2 À propos on Marguerite Kelduwier's Husband Jean Du Bois

Another connection between Declercq and du Bois is documented in Figure 34.442 on page 632 in Chapter 34.13.8.12.

Bernard Beghyn provides further information, noting that du Bois' descendants were du Bois de Sebbe, established in Lille and Béthune in the 17th century. This designation originated because Jean du Bois was Lord of Wollebeyt and Sebbe. He passed away in 1616 or 1617 and served as the receiver of Lille. He married Marguerite Kelduwier around 1599-1600. It is presumed that François Lamoral du Bois de Chocques et de Sebbe (also called Soble, Seble, Zeble) was their son.

It is plausible that this Jean du Bois was born in Wicres, between Lille and Béthune. Records mention a Maître Jean du Bois, son of Louis du Bois from Wicres and Aliénor de Michel from the same village, who married Michelle Carrez. They had one child, Jacqueline du Bois, who married Jean Dutriez in 1629, suggesting that Michelle Carrez likely died in childbirth. Jean du Bois from Wicres had a brother, Antoine du Bois, who was the Notaire, Greffier, and Receveur de la Seigneurie de Couppigny in Wicres. Other siblings included Barbe du Bois, Jeanne du Bois, and Isabeau de Bois. If Jean du Bois, who married Marguerite Kelduwier after the death of his first wife Michelle Carrez, is indeed the one born in Wicres, then he was not identified as Jan Van de Bossche, but genuinely as Jean du Bois in French.

It is essential to avoid hastily associating historical figures with modern national identities. For example, some might assume that Jean du Bois was Jan Van den Bossche or Jan Van Houtte to align with a modern Flemish identity, preferring the chapel of Deerlijk to be considered Flemish rather than French. Such assumptions overlook the broader historical context and the possibility that ancestors might have originated from different regions, spoken different languages, or been influenced by external factors. The perception of the Spanish period as an occupation filled with violence, primarily shaped by 16th and 17th-century Dutch propaganda, continues to influence modern Belgian education and nationalist sentiments, overshadowing the era's significant historical contributions.

Further research is necessary to identify Jean du Bois conclusively, but this task is beyond the scope of this book.

For additional insights, Chapter 18.10.1 discusses the connection between the Desclergues and the du Bois family in ancient times.

49.9.3 Narrative of the Chapel's Foundation

The process of founding a chapel is a complex and significant undertaking, comparable to a holy trinity. It involves the approval of a foundation deed by the Bishop, the physical construction requiring various earthly actions, documents, and resources, and the organization of the benefice and chaplaincy or patronage. This final step is crucial, as it involves managing the operation, covering expenses, securing resources, and granting the owner significant power, including the ability to nominate a chaplain and access clerical privileges. Once these arrangements are in place, the mission is accomplished.

The patron of a chapel is a worldly individual with the power to choose the chaplain to be nominated by the Bishop. In the case of the Du Bois family, their ownership of the chaplaincy, which provided them with ultimate ecclesiastical power, was a source of contention until 1690, the year Antoni Desclergue (DC06) passed away. His resistance was likely the final effort to prevent the chapel from entirely falling into the hands of the Du Bois family.

For the Du Bois family, owning a chapel was a prestigious achievement that might have caused a significant nuisance to Antoni, a devout Spanish Knight who lost his father in a notable Spanish victory and risked his life protecting Catholic Flanders from Protestants. The 1634 miracle occurred before a figurine brought by the Desclergues from Montblanc, and the new figurine, created by Cano, was brought by Antoni Desclergue (DC06) in 1639.

In the case of the chapel at Deerlijk, the lists of patrons and chaplains have been published in earlier works or will be included in the forthcoming works by the historians of Deerlijk. One notable patron was Eugene Lamoral du Bois (1754), the Lord of Chocques (modern-day Northern France) and an heir of Marguerite Kelduwier, widow of Jean du Bois, Eugene Lamoral's great-grandfather.

The chapel at Deerlijk was established by Marguerite Kelduwier, who financed the chaplaincy from 1641 onward. Eugene Lamoral Du Bois (Seigneur de Chocques et de Sebbe 1659-1702), married to Marie Waresquiel (Dame de Thérissart en Avelin 1651-1719), was a notable figure in the chapel's history.

Their daughter, Marie Eugenie Du Bois (Dame de Sebbe et de Chocques), passed away on August 28, 1723, in Béthune, Northern France. She married Jacques François Du Puich in 1706, and they had several children, including Antoine François Joseph Du Puich (Ecuyer, seigneur de Mesplau, de Maurepas. 1707-1766).

Antoine signed the chapel's patronage in Deerlijk in 1753-1755, transferring it to the Du Puich family. The name Du Puich is also spelled as Dupuis and, in Flemish, as Vandeputte, or even Steenput.

In 1701, Maria Declercgz (DC08d), discussed in Chapter 37.9.1, granddaughter of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), married Egidius Vandeputte (Gilles Du Puich), born in 1663 as the son of Mathias Vandeputte (Mathieu Du Puich) and Joanna Van Rumbeke. This family likely connects to the Du Puich family mentioned earlier, originating from or appearing in Cambrai as bourgeois in the 1600s. A Mathieu Du Puich is recorded as a bourgeois of Cambrai in 1633.

Further research is needed to establish a definitive connection with Jacques François Du Puich, who married Marie Eugénie du Bois in Lille in 1706, daughter of François Lamoral du Bois, son of Marguerite Kelduwier and Jean du Bois, and Marie Cardon.

Additional possible relatives of Marguerite Kelduwier have been found in Northern France, which also requires further investigation. Antoine de Le Quellerye, the Lord of La Cantereine (in Haubourdin[126]), lived in Douai and appeared in a 1627 deed in Carnières alongside Robert du Puich, a merchant and bourgeois of Cambrai.[127] Antoinette de Le Quellerye, married to Robert de Heranguière, also appears in this deed.

Carlos Coloma de Saa, governor of Cambrai from 1617 to 1632, participated in the 1595 French conquest of Cambrai by Spanish troops, including Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). Jeroni was severely wounded in battle and treated in the Sint-Jans-Hospital of Cambrai, where the future Bishop of Tournai served as a priest. In 1641, Antoni Desclergue donated to that hospital on behalf of his father.

Antoni Desclergue lived in Cambrai early in his military career, with his first wife.

In the mid-18th century, the Du Bois family continued as patrons, followed by the Du Puich or Vandeputte family. The archives indirectly suggest the involvement of the Desclergues. For instance, Jeroni Desclergue appears, in Chapter 29.8.3.1, once in documents from the Loos abbey near Lille from 1575-1605, visiting Dom Pierre Carpentier.[128] Guillaume du Puich also appeared on nine visits before Jeroni. Jeroni resided in Kortrijk for a few years and is listed in the archive as 'Jerôme Leclercq, de Courtrai.'

On April 17, 1611, a wedding took place in the Spaniard's Castle of Ghent between Miguel De Villanueba (from Alcorissa in Caragera, Spain) and Isabel du Puich from Haubourdin near Lille (Figure 29.125 on page 426).

Marguerite Kelduwier reserved the rent from two farms for the chapel, imposing an obligation for weekly services and additional services on Saint Mary's and Saint Joseph's days.[129]

It is assumed that Antoni Desclergue imposed this obligation to honor his father, Jeroni Desclergue, killed at Ostend in 1604, and his mother, Felipa de Montoya. Mary and Joseph symbolically represent his parents.

49.10 On Antoni Desclergue's Motives to Honor his Parents Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya

49.10.1 Introduction

The connection with Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) parents, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya, and the Main Square of Montblanc with the House of Desclergues clearly visible, is described and shown in Chapter 49.4.2 and Chapter 49.4.3.

Incorporating one's parents in ecclesiastic art is not evident and was done, by Antoni Desclergue (DC06), through representing saints carrying his parents name[130].

There are, however, additional elements pointing at Antoni's parents, described below.

49.10.2 Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) is Visible in the Montblanc Panel (nr 3) inside the Chapel

From a study of this panel, covered in Chapter 49.4.2 and Chapter 49.4.3, we know that the male figure originally represented the Saint Jerome of Stridon, also known as Saint Jerome of Bethlehem. A later removed lion at the end of the cane/leash is typical for Jerome's depictions. Hieronymus is representative of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), father of Antoni (DC06), and described in Chapter 29. Hieronymus holds a book under his arm, as it fits a Church Father. However, a book (or a pen) represents Jeroni's last name, Desclergue (Clergue, Clericus).

The face used for Jeroni is that of Hernàn Cortés (1485-1521) and is almost identical to an image well-known in the 17th century to Spaniards, in Figure 49.93 on page 1022.

Jeroni's (DC05) full name was Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés. His blood-relationship with Hernàn Cortés is described in Chapter 27.2, Chapter 25.1.3.2, and Chapter 27.20 and revealed in Figure 49.91 and Figure 49.92.

Indeed, his grandmother Maria Ana Cortés de Monroy y Vega Bazán was a cousin of Hernán Cortés, while his mother was related too. Antoni, who likely could not remember his father's face in 1640, must have ordered a look-alike of Hernán Cortés for the panel construction. Perhaps he has been told that his father looked like Hernán. In the flight from Egypt, another panel exposed in the Chapel, other references to Hernán Cortés are depicted, as shown in Figure 49.76 on page 1014.

Next to Jerome is a depiction of Saint Felipa (Beata Filippa Mareri or Felipa Mareri, +1236), representative of Felipa de Montoya, mother of Antoni, who died in 1628. She is covered in Chapter 49.10.3.

A characteristic feature used by Francisco de Zurbaran in Spain around 1640 is visible. The stick, held by Saint Jerom, appears in paintings by Zurburan, e.g., 'Asher,' in the series of the sons of Jacob, painted in the 1640s and still found at Durham, in the Auckland Castle Trust[131]. Zurbaran has made several paintings of Saint Jerome (San Jerónimo), always with a beard and hat, always with a book in his hand, often in the presence of the lion. He even painted Saint Jerome in the company of other saints (e.g., Saint Jerome with Saint Paula and Saint Eustochium, 1640-1650, oil on fabric, by Francisco de Zurbarán). Although we do not [129] It is of culinary importance to note that the famous Crema Catalana is also called Crema de Sant Josep because it was traditionally consumed on the day of Sant Josep. It is widely documented in Catalan literature and recipes from the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries, so it is considered one of the oldest desserts in Europe and finds its origin in the traditional custard. Saint Josep's day is still an official holiday in Madrid and Extremadura, on March 19, while Saint Mary is always celebrated on August 15, Asunción de la Virgen, in Belgium and entire Spain and perhaps most European countries.

[130] In Spain, a person celebrated two birthdays, namely his own and that of the Saint carrying his name.

She appears one time as Catharina Desclergue in a document in 1576 (Montblanc) in which it would have been harmful to reveal her true identity being a Cortés. The same document also hides the ancestry before Pere Desclergue, although it mentions that Pere Desclergue was important and respected and was buried in the Monastery of Montblanc ... which means that his ancestry cannot have been unknown. In 1599, the family again used its full name, i.e. Desclergue i Cortés, as the political landscape in 1599 permitted it. Because she was of higher nobility than the rest of the ancestry tree, her descendants would proudly want to be referred to as Desclergue y Cortés.

claim that Zurbarán made the sculpture in Deerlijk, it is made in the original colors and style we would expect of artists inspired by the school of Zurbaràn from around 1640.

Typical Saint Hieronymus images are given in Figure 49.94. Sant Jeroni is also known as Eusebius Sophronius Hiëronymus, Eusebio Hierónimo, and even Geronimo of Stridon. He is one of the four Grand Church Fathers and appears commonly on retables in Spain in the Baroque period. Sant Jeroni is typically depicted with a bible in his hand; he often wears a sombrero, and in his other hand, he either has a stick or a cross and sometimes an entire church. He is typically depicted with a beard and a lot of hair.

49.10.3 Felipa de Montoya is Visible on the Montblanc Panel (nr 3) inside the Chapel

Unlike Saint Hieronymus, the female figure in Figure 70.31 is not immediately apparent. It cannot have been Mary because a church is visible in the background. She's covering her heart underneath her veil and depicts Blessed Filippa Mareri (Beata Filippa Mareri or Felipa Mareri). Santa Felipa, who died in 1236, is often depicted holding a heart in her hand, but those images date from after the excavation in 1706 when it was found that her heart miraculously had not been lost with time. Before the excavation, she was remembered, apart from the miracles attributed to her, for not wanting to give her heart to a husband because she said she was already totally devoted to God and wanted to die as a virgin. On the Montblanc panel, she covers her heart with her hand to express that her love has already been reserved. There are other depictions of Santa Felipa where a bible replaces the heart.

Felipa was also the name of the mother of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), described in Chapter 29.10.

The image of Montblanc in Figure 70.31, with the house of Desclergue visible and with Jeroni (DC05) and Felipa in the foreground, was so chosen by Antoni Desclergue (DC06).

Filippa Mareri, who served as a reference to represent Felipa de Montoya, was from Petrella Salto and was considered a Saint a decade after her death in the 13th century (she was beatified by una bolla di Innocenzo IV nel 1247) and appears on old fresco's having an aureole as saints do. Petrella Salto was in the northern part of southern Italy's territory held by Felipe II of Spain in the 16th century, so the Spanish knew her.

(DC02d) Some literature assumes there was a Galceran I and a Galceran II, father and son, while, in fact, it was one and the same person who was active for many years.
Maria Anna Desclergue y Villavicencio
(DC02dx1) The literature sometimes refers to her as "Maria Anna Desclergue y de Ojeda", due to a misinterpretation of a notary document of 1551 (Registro 3, 995, 1551, Fo. 261. A.C.A. Barcelona) first investigated by Sanchez Real and later copied by others. In fact, Maria Anna Desclergue y Villavicencio was the daughter of Ana de Villavicencio, who died in 1537 and was raised by her aunt Brianda de Villavicencio.

49.10.4 Sancti Eusebii Hieronymi Stridonensis Presbyteri Opera Omnia

On the chapel, a direct reference was made to Jeroni and his wish to continue his life in Deerlijk, die there, and be buried there:
'Haec requies mea in saeculum saeculi; hic habitabo, quoniam elegi eam.'
This is a quote from Psalmi 131 Biblia Sacra Vulgata, also known as 'Sancti Eusebii Hieronymi Stridonensis presbyteri Opera omnia, Volume 10,' and is the work of the ecclesiastic father Saint Hieronymus (Jeroni). One can loosely translate the text as 'I want to rest here because I have found my place here.'
The inscription can still be retrieved on the oldest images of the chapel, such as Figure 49.8 on page 997 where we can also find La Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc.
Below, we cite Psaml 131 of Biblia Sacra Vulgata[132] of which lines 8 and 14 were written on the chapel, or at least above and below the figurine of La Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc in Deerlijk.

(1) Memento, Domine, David, et omnis mansuetudinis ejus:
(2) sicut juravit Domino; votum vovit Deo Jacob:
(3) Si introiero in tabernaculum domus meae; si ascendero in lectum strati mei;
(4) si dedero somnum oculis meis, et palpebris meis dormitationem,
(5) et requiem temporibus meis, donec inveniam locum Domino, tabernaculum Deo Jacob.
(6) Ecce audivimus eam in Ephrata; invenimus eam in campis silvae.
(7) Introibimus in tabernaculum ejus; adorabimus in loco ubi steterunt pedes ejus.
(8) Surge, Domine, in requiem tuam, tu et arca sanctificationis tuae.
(9) Sacerdotes tui induantur justitiam, et sancti tui exsultent.
(10) Propter David servum tuum non avertas faciem christi tui.
(11) Juravit Dominus David veritatem, et non frustrabitur eam: De fructu ventris tui ponam super sedem tuam.
(12) Si custodierint filii tui testamentum meum, et testimonia mea haec quae docebo eos, et filii eorum usque in saeculum sedebunt super sedem tuam.
(13) Quoniam elegit Dominus Sion: elegit eam in habitationem sibi.
(14) Haec requies mea in saeculum saeculi; hic habitabo, quoniam elegi
eam. (15) Viduam ejus benedicens benedicam; pauperes ejus saturabo panibus.
(16) Sacerdotes ejus induam salutari, et sancti ejus exsultatione exsultabunt.
(17) Illuc producam cornu David; paravi lucernam christo meo.
(18) Inimicos ejus induam confusione; super ipsum autem efflorebit sanctificatio mea.

This passage is a prayerful reflection and plea that draws upon the legacy of David, emphasizing his dedication and the covenant with God.
The text commences with a poignant call to remember David's humility and his solemn vow to God. It accentuates his resolute commitment to find a dwelling place for the Lord. The narrative then shifts to the compelling account of the search for, and the eventual discovery of, a sacred site in Ephrata. This significant event leads to the establishment of a chosen tabernacle and the subsequent worship at this hallowed place.
The invocation for God to arise and enter His resting place, along with the Ark, underscores the sanctity of the location. The plea continues with a request for righteousness to clothe the priests and joy to fill the saints. It references God's promise to David: to place his descendants on his throne, contingent on their adherence to God's covenant and teachings.
God's selection of Zion as His eternal dwelling is unequivocally affirmed. The passage then bestows blessings upon the widows, the poor, the priests, and the saints, promising sustenance and salvation. The passage culminates with a vivid and powerful prophetic vision of David's line flourishing, his enemies being shamed, and sanctity blossoming from his lineage, painting a vivid picture of the future.
This text, rooted in the tradition of the Psalms, reflects the intertwining of divine promise and human responsibility, which is central to the Davidic covenant and Zion's religious significance.
In particular, The Knights Templar derived their name from the Temple of Solomon in Jerusalem, where they were initially headquartered. The text's reference to finding a dwelling place for the Lord resonates with the Templars' association with the sacred Temple Mount.
A translation of the lines referring to Jeroni, including lines 8 and 14, which appeared on the chapel, goes as follows:

(3) If I shall enter into the tabernacle of my house;
(7) We will go into his tabernacle: We will adore in the place where his feet stood.
(8) Arise, O Lord, into thy resting place: thou and the ark[133], which thou hast sanctified.
(13) For the Lord hath chosen Sion: he hath chosen it for his dwelling.
(14) This is my rest forever and ever: here will I dwell, for I have chosen it.
(15) Blessing, I will bless her, the widow;
(18) His enemies I will clothe with confusion: but upon him will my sanctification flourish.

[132] Psalmi 131, Biblia Sacra Vulgata, also known as 'Sancti Eusebii Hieronymi Stridonensis presbyteri Opera omnia, Volume 10,' by Saint Hieronymus (San Jeronimo). Line (14) was written on the Chapel at Deerlijk.

[133] Note that the word ark was 'ărôn' in Hebrew and referred to casket or coffin and was not always used to refer to the covenant ark.

Figure 49.97: This is Fort Colombye in 1602 near Ostend, where the Desclergues stayed. The chapel at Colombye was that of San Miguel. It looks indeed similar to the later chapel at Deerlijk. (map of Ostend, 1602, Rijksmuseum Amsterdam)

It is clear that several fractions in Jeronimo's 131st Psalm refer to Antoni Desclergue's father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue, to Montblanc and the choice of Deerlijk as a place of residence and perhaps as Jeroni's final resting place. Line 3 refers to the Casal Desclergue on the Plaza Mayor of Montblanc. Line 7 refers to the fact that Jeroni came from Montblanc. Line 13 refers to the hill of Sion,[134] which also symbolizes the mountain of the town of Montblanc. Line 14 refers to Jeroni's choice of Deerlijk as a residence and even Antoni's choice. Line 15 refers to Antoni's mother, Felipa de Montoya, who was the widow of Jeroni Desclergue. Line 18 refers to the ambiguity in the use of the name Desclergue, Le Clercq, and Declercq as a function of the circumstances while, on the one hand, having the Flemish identity and, on the other hand, the Catalan or Spanish identity. If we translate line 8 literally, we have 'Come to your resting place in your coffin, my father.'

Hieronymus Pslam 131 was mainly known in Spain, as seen in a letter written by Martín Garayzábal Jiménez (Nalda, Spain 1583 - Monte Carmelo, Israel, 1653). He was better known as Próspero del Espíritu Santo and wrote his letter to the Provincial of Naples, Fr. Philip of St. James, in which he wrote: 'All I desire is to love God, serve Him and suffer for His love, thank Him all my life and die here on this holy mountain. Haec requies mea in saeculum saeculi. Hic habitabo quoniam elegi eam.' Indeed, he used the same Latin expression written in 1639 on the Chapel of Deerlijk. He likely chose this Psalm because it referred to Sion's hill, as Próspero del Espíritu Santo settled on Monte Carmelo in 1631 and justified his decision. Interestingly, this choice was a consequence of literature in the 16th century by Juan de la Cruz, who wrote the book Subida al Monte Carmelo. Juan de la Cruz's real name was Juan de Yepes Álvarez (Avila, Spain, 1542 - Ubeda, Jaen, Spain, 1591).

Perhaps of even higher importance is the legend, described at the beginning of Chapter 29 about Saint Hieronymus's life. He is known for removing a thorn from a lion's leg, as in Figure 29.4 on page 29.4, just like Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) initiated the assault, described in Chapter 29.5.28, which resulted in a final Belgian-Spanish accomplishment to remove the thorn from the Leo Belgicus. The thorn was 'occupied Ostend' , while the Leo Belgicus represented the Spanish Netherlands. The close-to-the-heart association by Antoni (DC06) of his father with Saint Hieronymus, revealed in the chapel in Deerlijk, is sound and precise and goes further than only the similarity of their names.

49.11 Noteworthy Curiosities

49.11.1 Numerology, Size and Orientation

Perceived patterns in numerology are often coincidental or the result of cognitive biases, such as the human tendency to find meaning in random data. Consequently, this chapter does not advocate for numerology.

Furthermore, we do not intend to delve extensively into encoded messages, although such an exploration would undoubtedly be fascinating. Nevertheless, some striking observations have been made; some may be coincidental, while others may be more substantial.

In earlier chapters, we have facts such as the existence of the Montblanc Panel, the presence of an S in the facade, and the chapel's construction in 1639. These facts are incontrovertible. Here, however, we examine more meticulous observations, some of which may be disputed while others are irrefutable.

Masons were esteemed craftsmen and men of honor. While human error is inevitable, these artisans ensured no mistakes were made [134] During the Crusades, Mount Zion or Sion held strategic and symbolic importance. The Crusaders, including the Templars, venerated Mount Zion as a key location in their religious and military campaigns.

Cadran solaire

Ce cadran solaire est aussi une table d'orientation sur laquelle Laon est située au centre du monde. Après celui des heures, un cercle donne la direction des villes françaises (sont incluses Namur, Louvain, Genève…). Un second cercle donne de nombreuses localités du monde, dont les coordonnées spatiales sont inscrites : longitude et latitude. Malgré la mention du Méridien de Paris, tout en haut, la longitude 0 est le Méridien de Ferro passant par l'île de Fer, la plus petite île des Canaries, noté 360° sur le cadran. Adoptée en 1634, cette disposition est encore en vigueur en 1770, avant que le Méridien de Paris puis celui de Greenwich ne deviennent la norme internationale. Les lettres S et M mentionnées après la latitude indiquent si la ville se trouve au Septentrion ou au Midi de l'Equateur.
Ce cadran indique les distances évaluées entre Laon et chacune des villes, toutes données en lieue (en Picardie, 1 lieue = 4,44 km), les informations étant à peu près correctes.
On lit quelques noms oubliés par la géographie moderne : Ségestan (ancienne région perse entre l'Iran et l'Afghanistan), Terre Australe du Saint-Esprit (aujourd'hui Vanuatu, en Mélanésie), Meaco (Kyoto), Batavia (capitale des Indes néerlandaises, aujourd'hui Djakarta) …

Figure 49.98: Historical Geocentric Sundial at Laon. This sundial doubles as an orientation table, positioning Laon at the world's center. It features two concentric circles: the inner circle indicates the direction and approximate distances to French cities (including Namur, Leuven, and Geneva), while the outer circle details global localities with their longitudinal and latitudinal coordinates. Notably, the sundial adheres to the Meridian of Ferro as longitude 0, recognized until the international adoption of the Paris and subsequently the Greenwich Meridian. The sundial also marks cities with 'S' or 'M' to denote their placement relative to the Equator and measures distances in leagues based on the Picardy standard (1 league = 4.44 km). Additionally, the dial records several now-obsolete geographic names such as Segestan, Southern Land of the Holy Spirit (current Vanuatu), Meaco (Kyoto), and Batavia (now Jakarta), reflecting a blend of historical and geographical knowledge circa 1770.

in constructing a holy chapel. Any deviation from the traditional eastward orientation of a chapel was intentional and purposeful, as will be discussed in detail below.

49.11.1.1 Indicators in the Montblanc Panel

In the Montblanc panel, the perspective view highlights only the buildings of interest. The building on the right appears as a distinctive corner, standing out from the rest of the frame. This triangular representation might symbolize the Greek Delta, the first letter in 'Desclergue.' However, the Delta has three sides, hence the importance of the number 3.

The number 3 is also prevalent in the image: there are three buildings, three divisions in the Gothic window of the structure on the right, three gates visible in the Casal dels Desclergue, three feet, three sides of the frame instead of four, Felipa counting three on her visible hand (starting with her thumb), only three of the probably ten battlements visible on the Desclergue building and the side of the structure on the right, and three levels in the Desclergue building. The alphabet's third letter is C, which stands for 'Clergues.'

To the observer, the bottom of the building forms a V-shape, while the top creates a Delta shape. The 'V' stands for 'B' (as in Veatrix = Beatrix; referencing the Christian martyrs Simplicius, Faustinus, and Veatrix, who died around 203 AD) and may have represented Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC07), possibly at her insistence.

Ten is the number of battlements on each side of the right building, and probably also on the middle building, which may represent the Greek 'Kappa,' the 10th character of the Greek alphabet. As there was no 'C' in Greek, unlike in Latin, the Greek Kappa also stands for 'C' in 'Clergue.'

That building contains 2x10 layers of stones, which may symbolize two instances of Kappa, one for Desclergue, i.e., Antoni, and one for Declercq, i.e., Beatrice.

49.11.1.2 The Prominent S character

The presence of the letter S on the façade of the chapel presents a noteworthy observation. While the evidence is inconclusive, it is a compelling indicator warranting further examination. Some interpretations may be speculative but provide an intriguing basis for scholarly exploration.

The use of fish bladders as ornaments in Gothic and neo-Gothic architecture is not unique, though typically, three are used together rather than two.

The neo-Gothic façade window above the entrance was constructed later, replacing the original design, which featured two rectangular (possibly gently curved) windows with a circular one above. The new window was installed in 1884, as evidenced by a photograph taken during the chapel's reconstruction (Figure 49.111, page 1031). The letter 'S' inclusion during this reconstruction likely aimed to preserve an existing feature, as there is no other apparent reason for its addition.

It is important to note that the chapel became the property of Astère Vercruysse in 1903. Vercruysse later changed his name to Vercruysse de Solart in 1912, indicating that the 'S' does not relate to 'Solart.'[135]

Several plausible explanations for the 'S' can be proposed.

The most straightforward interpretation is that 'S' stands for 'Spagnien,' the old Flemish term for 'Spain.'

The circular shape of the original window might symbolize 'Ostend.' Additionally, a close inspection reveals that the 'S' comprises a straight and a reversed 'C' character. In classical Latin, this combination represented 'CD' or '1000.' As a descendant of notaries, [135] However, Vercruysse might have been inspired to add a name extension beginning with 'S' because of the 'S' on the chapel he purchased.

Antoni would likely have been aware of this notation. In his era, modern Latin was in use, where '1000' is denoted as 'M,' possibly indicating 'Montblanc' or 'Miles' (soldier).

Furthermore, Freddy Byttebier noted in October 2020 that the anchor plates on either side of the chapel's front window also feature S-shapes. A bibliographic investigation reveals that such a design is uncommon in Belgium but more prevalent in England and Spain (e.g., Galicia).

49.11.1.3 The Year 1639

The chapel's most prominent feature is the inscription 1639 on the west wall above the entrance, as depicted in Figure 49.103 on page 1029. This year, 1639, was likely chosen deliberately by Antoni Desclergue, whose Spanish heritage includes notaries, scribes, and Knights Templar—individuals often associated with mysticism.

The year 1639 may serve as a numerical acronym, 1639 = AFCI, derived from Anthonius filius capitanei Ieronimi, translating to 'Antoni, the son of Captain Jeroni.' In Castilian, this reads Antonio, el hijo del capitán Jerónimo, and in Catalan, Antoni, el fill del capità Jeroni. Notably, in the 17th century, the letter J was commonly written as I. For instance, Chapter 29 on Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) mentions his death in 1628, with his name spelled as Don Ieronimo de Cleriges. This intentional choice of the year 1639 may indicate the actual patron of the chapel or the individual who provided significant support for its construction.

Moreover, the chapel's interior width, as accurately depicted in Despriet's article, measures 16 pies, considering the Castilian foot measurement (1 pie = 0.278635 m). Before its extension, the chapel's original length was 39 pies. While it cannot be confirmed that the 'S' symbol has always been at the same height on the west façade, it currently resides at 20 pies, which translates to 16 and 4 pies. This measurement is symbolic of the year 1604, marking Ostend's liberation and Jeroni Desclergue's death.

49.11.1.4 The Chapel's Ostend-Montblanc Orientation

The orientation of the chapel, in Figure 49.96, is remarkable. It is not entirely East-West and North-South, such as the St. Columba church, but is the geodetic direction, to a 0.1-degree precision from Ostend, where Jeroni died, to Montblanc, where the Desclergues were from.

The coordinates of the Casal dels Desclergue are 41.376826, 1.161664, while those of Paul and Peter's church in Ostend are 51.229734, 2.921268.

To find the direction from one place to another, we need to check a Mercator Projection map on the globe. Alternatively, there are tools on the internet to work out the geodetic problem. For instance, for the given coordinates, 'planetcalc dot com' offers the following result: distance in km: 1103.525 km. Azimuth: 187 deg 1min 41 sec, compass point in degrees 185 deg 37 min 30 sec and compass point in decimal degrees 185.625 degrees.

The direction between both places is 5.625 degrees off the North-South axis. On Google Maps®, the chapel (coordinates 50.850920, 3.353844) is clearly and visibly drawn.

Based on this map, the chapel's rotation angle is 5.6 +/- 0.1, which means that the chapel's facade is oriented perfectly parallel to the axis Montblanc-Ostend.

Interestingly, the chapel where we believe a service must have been held in Ostend after the death of Jeroni Desclergue, shown in Figure 49.97, shows similarities with the one in Deerlijk, constructed almost 35 years later.

In 1639, geolocation was well-established, and navigators and the military knew how to find directions to distant cities.

For instance, the Astrolabe, Predating the solar quadrant, is one of the most significant ancient instruments that combined astronomical, geographic, and navigational uses. Originating possibly as far back as the 2nd century BC with the Greeks and later developed significantly by Islamic scholars during the medieval period, astrolabes could be used to determine the time during the day or night, locate and predict the positions of the Sun, Moon, planets, and stars, and in some designs, to identify the direction and distance to various cities.

The Mariner's Astrolabe is a practical adaptation of the traditional astrolabe. It was explicitly designed for use at sea and was in use by the early 15th century. This instrument was crucial for navigation by the Portuguese and Spanish during the Age of Exploration, demonstrating its real-world applications and importance in historical navigation.

A testament to the Islamic world's rich cultural and scientific heritage, Islamic scholars and astronomers refined several types of quadrants. The Sine quadrant and the Horary quadrant are notable examples, used as early as the 10th century. These instruments were not just tools for navigation and timekeeping, but also cultural artifacts, some of which were inscribed with the coordinates or directions to significant cities within the Islamic world.

While not a quadrant, the Erdapfel, known as the Nuremberg Terrestrial Globe of 1492 by Martin Behaim, is an exciting example of an instrument providing geographical orientation. It features an extensive depiction of known and speculative geography, complete with distances and directions relative to Nuremberg.

The postulation that the Flemish and Spanish within the region possessed an understanding of the bearings to distant urban centers is not solely inferred from the navigational competencies historically attributed to that era. Tangible artifacts further corroborate the assertion.

An example of a century-later solar quadrant, around 1770, found at the archaeological museum in Laon is shown in Figure 49.98. The Laon solar quadrant provides azimuthal information to proximate and remote municipalities, including locales perceived as exotic and situated on the antipodal side of the Earth, and facilitates the determination of solar time. This instrument embodies a critical intersection of maritime science and geographic exploration, reflecting an advanced understanding of solar positioning mechanisms pertinent during that era.

49.12 À Propos about the Legend

The renowned legend has been previously discussed in Chapters 49.2.2 and 49.5. Echoing Bruggeman's perspective, we assert that legends invariably contain elements of veracity.

We agree that enduring legends cannot be founded on falsehoods. While narratives may become embellished or altered over time, the foundation of a legend is invariably rooted in truth. Enduring legends cannot be founded on falsehoods. While narratives may become embellished or altered over time, the foundation of a legend is invariably rooted in truth. When the core of a legend involves a knight, his wife, and child and references a saw (Serra), with the earliest depictions illustrating Montblanc's 'La Mare de Déu de la Serra,' this core origin must be grounded in truth. Even more so, when the legend's core continues to be narrated by the people of Deerlijk, despite changes in the official written accounts over time, its persistence affirms its truth.

Figure 49.100: This (re-)print, fabricated in 1840 by De Pourcq-Block in Ghent, depicts the Chapel's legend. Although the artist may have intended to illustrate the de Cassina family, everything indicates that the persons seen behind the carriage are Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), Antoni Desclergue (DC06), and their son Antoni (DC07). Something as crucial as the relative position of the church of Deerlijk and the Chapel appears wrong and assumes that the image was once sketched and mirrored, while other details are remarkably correct. In particular, their clothes resemble Spanish in the 1630s. Also, the clock indicates 00:34, which may be the artist's indication of the year 34 of the 17th century. The clock does not appear mirrored. The chart is pulled by five horses, with two additional ones attached in the front. God's eye, appearing in the church, is also a custom initiated in that period, although the symbol is much older.[136] In contrast to the earliest image of the Chapel, the child Jesus carries a globe in this sketch. Indeed, as time progressed, a globe was depicted rather than the script, likely to seek consistency with a statuette at Deerlijk exposing the same. It was in the oldest, therefore most correct, depiction that the statue of Mary with Jesus perfectly resembled that of la Mare de Deu de la Serra of Montblanc. Two paintings exist, too, from relatively recent times, shown in Figure 49.101 and Figure 49.102.

In the 18th-century legend, Lord Cassina is erroneously portrayed as the nobleman involved in Deerlijk's 1634 Chapel history. However, research reveals the existence of Piere Philippe François Cassina, Lord of Wonsheim, who married Marie-Louise Josephe de Plotho in 1734, and Adrien Cassina, born François Cassina, who became an Abbé at Eename from 1744 onwards. The first member of the Cassina family documented in Deerlijk is Philippe Guillaume de Cassina[137], who in 1707 acquired approximately 60% of the territory known as 'Asschendries' and the church of Deerlijk, thus earning the title 'Lord of Deerlijk.' Before this, around 1639, the Manor of Deerlijk was owned by Simon de Lamotte (Lord of Baraffe, Bourgenbray, and Deerlijk). Consequently, the Cassina family played no role in the foundational history of the Chapel of Deerlijk.
The Cassina family, originating from Italy, had substantial connections to Spain and Austria, which may explain their interest in the Chapel during the early 18th century, possibly due to their awareness of its Spanish origins. The legend in Figure 49.100 refers to Adrianus Andries de Cassina, but this is not the oldest extant illustration. Historical evidence shows that Adrianus Andries was responsible for constructing another chapel around 1666 in Sint Lodewijk (Saint Louis), previously known as Pladijshoek, Keyselberge, or Bottenhoek. This Chapel served as the predecessor of the current church in Sint Lodewijk, located 200 meters from the Declercq de Silva family grave, as detailed in Chapter 50.
The residents of Deerlijk likely conflated Adrianus Andries with their knowledge of a southern Knight involved in the Chapel's establishment, mistakenly associating this historical figure with the Cassina family of the 18th century. Additionally, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was well-acquainted with all the miracle witnesses. At the time of the miracle in 1634, Antoni was married to Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) and had a son, Antoni (DC07), who was around ten. The oldest depictions of the Chapel showing the miracle feature a man, his wife, and a son of the correct age. The man is portrayed wearing a Spanish collar, a fashion introduced in Flanders by the Spanish and popular among noblemen between 1550 and 1640.
Therefore, Figure 49.100 does not depict the de Cassina family but rather Antoni (DC06), Beatrice, and their son Antoni (C07). A more significant depiction of the Chapel and the miracle is found in Figure 49.8 on page 997, where the horses are shown stopping in front of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc, illustrated in Figure 49.1 on page 977, with text referencing Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), the father of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), as discussed in Chapter 49.10.4.
It would not be surprising if Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya were buried beneath the Chapel, where a tree once stood. The land between the trees might have served as a cemetery for the Spanish military residing in Deerlijk around 1600. Spanish soldiers and their families were not disposed of in rivers upon death; therefore, there must have been designated burial sites. However, the literature remains silent on the specific locations of these burial grounds.

49.13 The Chapel's History After the Spanish Period, Further Connections with the Desclergues and a Miracle in 1884

49.13.1 The Chapel's Earthly Service and Renovations

Between 1759 and 1773, the chapel, under the watchful eye of Petrus de Backer, underwent significant renovations, with new furniture being introduced. In 1797, the chapel was seized by the French and sold, only to be acquired by Joseph Eeckhout, a man with a vision for its preservation. From 1802, religious activities resumed, and the chapel was then taken over by Van der Elst, although it remained closed to visitors. The 'Armendis' inherited the chapel, but it lay dormant until 1819 when architect Vancaeneghem transformed it into a 'Spinschool.' The chapel served as a school until 1848.

[137] There were no 'de Cassina' inhabitants in Deerlijk in the 17th century. For those interested in the 'de Cassina' lineage, the 17th-century registers of Nederboelare should be consulted. Refer to Figure 49.99.

Although they have been professionally filled with similar bricks to the original ones (perhaps they were reused from the new window's location), one can see the original areas and zones where bricks have been squeezed in. Also, the vertical edges of the new window clearly show signs of bricks placed after the initial construction of the chapel. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

Other materials are sometimes visible as warmer objects, such as the cross in the upper figure. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

After a typhus outbreak in 1847, the chapel was repurposed as a hospital, a role it held until it became a school for textile weavers. The school's success led to its relocation to a better facility, and the chapel then served as a 'textile weave school for women' until 1883.

The chapel, after a period of closure, was purchased by the parish of Deerlijk with the aid of local crowdfunding and the support of Felix Loquet and Adolf de Bien. From 1884, the chapel was once again a Catholic church, thanks to the restoration efforts of Jan van Ruymbeke. He renewed the roof, the tower, and installed neogothic tracery, while also renovating the interior. The old statue of Mary was reinstalled, and the chapel was rededicated with a Marian poem or song composed by Guido Gezelle.

In 1902, Astère Vercruysse purchased the chapel, though it remained under the parish's practical ownership. Vercruysse beautified the chapel and whitened the interior walls. After his death, the chapel reverted to the parish. In 1965, the chapel was repainted, and war damage was repaired. Regarding the original retable, one panel depicted the Main Square of Montblanc in Spain, indicating that the chapel became a spin school after the 1819 reconstruction. The original retable was likely dismantled for this purpose and stored, or it may have been incorporated into the Onze-Lieve-Vrouw Ter Ruste Chapel in the Saint Columba Church of Deerlijk before returning to the chapel.

In 1884, the chapel was restored by Jan Van Ruymbeke from Kortrijk and resumed its function as a chapel on March 25, 1884. Van Ruymbeke renewed the interior furniture and likely installed a new retable, reusing parts of the old one as panels for the seven sorrows of Mary. Installing the seven sorrows required restoring the reliefs and placing them in newly constructed shallow alcoves, necessitating the collection of 1200 francs. This amount was approximately 60% of the funds needed to replace the chapel's small tower, including the bell, totaling 2000 francs.

It suggests that the panels' purchase was not included in the donated amount, as it would have significantly increased the cost. The bell[138][139] likely cost no more than 200 francs, indicating that the little tower without the bell was around 1800 francs.

Thus, constructing eight alcoves and properly placing the seven reliefs, along with fabricating an additional panel with text, cost 65% of the amount needed for the small tower, which is logical and would not have been feasible if the baroque reliefs had been newly sculpted in 1884.

Further evidence in Chapter 49.4 supports that the panels were originally present in the 1600s, having been part of the demolished retable in 1819-1820 when the east façade was opened to expand the chapel.

Specifically, the Montblanc panel depicting Sant Jeroni and Santa Felipa was repurposed to represent Joseph and Mary searching for the lost Jesus in the temple. The relief was partially overpainted, and the lion at the end of Jeroni's staff was removed to resemble Joseph better.

However, Jeroni still wears a sombrero, and the scene includes a church, making it clear that it could not depict Mary and Joseph during Jesus' lifetime. Additionally, the buildings' gothic style does not represent the 1st century.

49.13.2 The Original Architecture Revealed with the Naked Eye

A house in Cassel, located in La Flandre, France, erected in 1631 during the period when the town was under Spanish control, serves as a comparative reference to the Chapel at Deerlijk in Figure 49.103.

As depicted in Figure 49.104, the craftsmanship of the masons and the materials used in both constructions share notable similarities, particularly in using bricks. However, there are significant differences as well. The date anchors of the chapel are positioned higher and narrower compared to those in Cassel. While both structures employ stones to form the foundation upon which bricks are laid, the attention to symmetry and proportions is less pronounced in Cassel.

[139] The exchange rate of gulden and francs.

A distinctive feature of the chapel is a circular opening with the letter 'S,' typical of Spanish architectural influence, situated at the same height in both the original and current versions of the chapel. This contrasts with the rectangular upper window found in the Cassel house. Additionally, the gutters in Cassel are constructed using natural stone, whereas those in the chapel are built on wooden supports. The Cassel house also features supporting beams on its unseen side, a technique not employed at Deerlijk.

The architectural similarities between the house in Cassel and the chapel in Deerlijk suggest that the masons may have originated from the southern region of Flanders, which is now part of northern France. This region includes towns such as Douai, Béthune, and Cambrai, which align with the historical context of the chapel's establishment discussed earlier in this chapter.

49.13.3 The Original Architecture Revealed with Infrared Imaging

Chapter 49.4.3 details infrared investigations in the chapel.

Although the experiments[140] were conducted using simple methods, they yielded new and significant information. The procedure involves gently heating a wall (by a few degrees Celsius at most) and then allowing it to cool to ambient temperature. Photographs are taken with a heat camera (infrared camera) during the cooling phase. This technique can reveal structural variations in the wall or its coverings, provided there are differences in thermal properties. For example, wood absorbs and releases heat at a different rate than stone, causing slight temperature differences between the materials that can be observed with a heat camera.

The precision of the infrared images, as demonstrated in Figures 49.105, 49.106, 49.107, 49.108, and 49.109, has been optimized to make measurable variations visible. These results, which confirm the alignment of the chapel's original architecture with the oldest known images, provide a strong foundation for our findings. Furthermore, the installation of the panels in later fabricated alcoves after being recycled from the original retable is a testament to the meticulousness of our research.

The author has not underestimated the potential of the technique of detecting hidden frescoes with an infrared camera. As a reference, three infrared images of uncovered frescoes in the Sint-Columba church in Deerlijk are shown in Figure 49.107. These images, while not revealing much, highlight the striking gold-plated parts, which have significantly different thermal properties compared to the underlying and surrounding paint and lime. This aspect, which can be utilized in Kapel-ter-Ruste to trace any hidden frescoes, is a testament to the potential of our research.

Initially, it was hoped that frescoes might be found under the chapel's white paint in Kapel-ter-Ruste, but this was not immediately observed. Given the findings in the church of Sint Columba, this is unsurprising. However, circles were found in various places in the images. These circles are possibly, if not probably, halos and may, therefore, indicate hidden frescoes beneath the paint. The location of the assumed frescoes suggests they decorated the chapel walls before the panels with the polychrome reliefs[141] were placed as alcoves in the side walls.

Along the Southern wall, to the right when entering the chapel, between the holy water tank and the Montblanc panel, two possible indications of structures under the paint were found in the infrared images. These may be part of a hidden fresco, as shown in Figures 49.108 and 49.109.

The combination of a gilded halo with a cross-shaped structure at the bottom left may represent a fraction of an image of Saint Gregory, who, either sitting on a horse or standing with a spear, is depicted killing a dragon. This hypothesis is plausible since San Jordi is the patron saint of Catalonia and is particularly associated with the town of Montblanc. However, we cannot be certain purely based on these two visible elements, and some imagination is involved here, as illustrated in Figure 49.109.

49.13.4 Restoration and Colors

Throughout the centuries, the chapel has undergone numerous repairs and restorations. In 1760, J. Dooms from Harelbeke painted the interior walls, possibly concealing older frescoes. He utilized chalk from Tournai and notably employed Spanish green ceruse. This tasteful restoration, which included the use of Spanish green, suggests the presence of green ornaments in the church. As described above, the panels of Mary's Seven Sorrows depict figures dressed in Spanish green attire beneath the new layer of paint, reminiscent of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc. This indicates that these panels were part of the retable in 1760. Their re-installation on the sidewalls in 1884 followed a period of refurbishment and redesignation.

In 1819, the chapel underwent a significant transformation when Pierre Rosseel from Harelbeke converted it into a spinning school. This adaptive reuse of the building not only preserved its structure but also served a new purpose. Subsequent restorations in 1884, led by Jan van Ruymbeke from Kortrijk, further enhanced the chapel's appearance, replacing the tower and installing tracery. Despite these changes, relics from the past, as shown in Figure 49.103, still remain visible on the façade, adding to the chapel's historical charm.

Figure 49.111, depicting the chapel in 1884, reveals that the original tower had been replaced and all modern tracery was absent. The roof had also been renewed. Since then, the chapel's exterior has remained largely unchanged, undergoing repairs only when necessary. In 1903, a new chapter in the chapel's history began when Astère Vercruysse acquired the building. He commissioned Hilaire Degezelle to repaint the walls and install a new stained glass window on the east side. This window, featuring a letter 'M' for 'Maria' and the Vercruysse family shield, was a testament to the Vercruysse family's connection to the chapel. It was installed before their ennoblement as Vercruysse de Solart, marking a significant period in the chapel's history.

Further repairs were conducted on the chapel in 1965, ensuring its continued preservation.

49.13.5 Later Desclergue Connections

Philippe Despriet[142] documents a significant historical fact. When Petrus De Backer, the owner of the chaplaincy, died on August 1, 1773, the chaplaincy was inherited by Frans Cornelis van der Helst. Van der Helst had access to extensive archives and had served as vicar in Harelbeke, Lauwe, and Beveren-bij-Roeselare.

[140] On Friday, February 28, 2020, experiments were conducted using an infrared camera with a temperature resolution of 50 mK in the Kapel-ter-Ruste and the church of Saint Columba. The experiments involved an infrared source and an infrared camera. They were conducted in the presence of Priest Marc Messiaen, Luc Beke, Frans Declercq, Marc Vergote, Antoon Vanhoutte, and Lambert Declercq.

[142] Philippe Despriet, 'De Kapel van O.-L.-Vrouw Ter Ruste Te Deerlijk,' in Derlike, Driemaandelijks tijdschrift van de heemkring 'Dorp en Toren,' Deerlijk, 6de jaargang, nr 4, april-mei-juni 1984.

In compliance with a mandate issued by Maria Theresia of Austria, he was required to formally declare the origins of the chapel in 1786-1787. At that time, he was serving as the chaplain of the Chapel at Deerlijk and as the vicar of Hulste. Van der Helst stated that he did not know the exact founder of the chapel and noted that the foundation deed was located in Tournai, and possibly also with the contemporary owner of the chapel, Eugene Joseph Du Puich de Bouclier (Lord of Mesplau).[143]

The following year, van der Helst informed Frans Joseph Cooreman, the Dean in Kortrijk, that the chapel was constructed in 1639 by Walrand du Bois and that one mass per week was obligatory.[144]

It is reasonable to assume that the chapel's actual foundation deed, stored in Tournai, likely contains the name of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), who was a witness to the miracle in 1634. The first financial records charge Marguerite Kelduwier, whose contribution is thus indisputable.

Returning to Frans Cornelis van der Helst, his tenure as vicar of Hulste both before and after 1786 is noteworthy. This period coincides with the life of Renier Declercq (DC10), discussed in Chapter 40, who was married to Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde (born in Hulste in 1750) and was the great-grandson of Antoni Desclergue (III) (DC07).

Renier Declercq resided in Hulste while his father, Joan Declercq (II) (DC09), mentioned in Chapter 39, was born in Deerlijk in 1706.

In the 17th century, Hulste was associated with the families de Liedekerke and Van der Gracht, all related to Carlos Coloma, the superior of Antoni Desclergue II (DC06) and a companion of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), Antoni's father.

Additionally, the De Vos (Vosa) branch of the Desclergue family, discussed in Part X, descendants of Antoni Desclergue (III) (DC07), was established in Hulste.

Of particular interest is that, in 1803, priest van der Helst was vicar in Oekene, just west of Izegem. Renier Declercq (DC10) was still alive at this time. Renier Declercq was active as a witness at births and weddings in Izegem-Ingelmunster-Hulste-Kuurne, indicating geographical proximity to van der Helst. They were likely contemporaries, as they died around the same time; Renier was born in 1740 and died in 1808, while van der Helst died in 1807 or 1808.

It is reasonable to speculate that van der Helst attempted to obscure the chapel's links to Spain to protect it and the associated family from potential repercussions from the French or Austrian authorities.

In Chapter 44.8, we discuss the connection with Deerlijk maintained by Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14). Furthermore, in Chapter 45.5, we explore how Michel Declercq (DC15), born in Wielsbeke, sought refuge near the chapel in Deerlijk after facing severe financial difficulties due to the flax financial crises in the 1930s.

49.13.6 The Chapel's Second Miracle in 1884

On April 2, 1884, Octavie Vangheluwe, born on May 1, 1845, and who would pass away on May 7, 1893, experienced a miraculous healing. After being bedridden for two and a half years, she suddenly recovered and presented herself to her neighbors to demonstrate her newfound health. This event not only astonished the entire village, but it also sparked a wave of hope and faith, as they witnessed what they perceived to be a miracle.

In the context of this book, it is noteworthy that Octavie Vangheluwe was the grand-aunt of Gerard Vangheluwe, the author's great-grandfather. She is further described in Chapter 69.8.2.2. The chapel is a classified and protected monument in Deerlijk and can be found as item 86341 in the inventory of 'onroerend erfgoed Vlaanderen.' [145]

The Church of Saint Louis or Sint Lodewijk in Deerlijk

Figure 50.1: Louis IX, whose feast is on August 25, acceded to the throne of France at the age of 12, under the regency of his mother, Blanche de Castille, in 1226. In 1234, he married Marguerite de Provence, who gave him 11 children. His spirituality as a Franciscan tertiary led him to care for the poor and be faithful to reciting the hours of the divine office that punctuated his days. After the conquest of Jerusalem by the Sultan of Egypt, he promoted the 7th Crusade and, on his return, built the Sainte-Chapelle to house the Crown of Thorns, purchased from Beaudoin II, Emperor of Constantinople. He died during the 8th Crusade in 1270. Canonized in 1297, he remains the living model of the lay saint.

50.1 Introduction

The evidence suggesting involvement in constructing a second chapel in Deerlijk, which would later evolve into the Church of Saint Louis, remains inconclusive but cannot be disregarded. This analysis, while somewhat speculative, is grounded in logical inference. Antoni Desclergue (DC06), a military figure or retired officer of significant age, as detailed in Chapter 34, possessed the requisite moral and social authority that could have facilitated such involvement.

Specifically, we hypothesize his influence in the early veneration of Saint Louis, coinciding with or shortly following the chapel's establishment. This period aligns with the French invasion during the War of Devolution (1667-1669), as detailed in Chapter 34.10, which likely inspired the local populace to dedicate the church to Saint Louis later. Furthermore, it is crucial to consider the probable Spanish influence in the initial naming of the hill on which Saint Louis is situated.

A pivotal figure in this narrative is Adriaan Andries. Both Adriaan and his ancestors maintained a longstanding acquaintance with the Declercq family, including Beatrice Declercq. Furthermore, they were also connected to Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05).

50.2 The Origins of Saint Louis

Saint Louis[1], a southern suburb of Deerlijk, developed later than the village's northern site.

Initially, the area was predominantly forested and used as a hunting ground for the nobility. By the end of the 16th century, Saint Louis began to develop more steadily, achieving an average population density by the 17th century. Despite this growth, there was no chapel or church at that time.

The earliest known name for the entire area was likely Male. Within the Male region of Deerlijk, two notable toponyms were Olijbeerch (Olieberg) and Keesebeerch (Keesberg).[2]

In its early development stages, the suburb comprised only a few homes and farms. The community was likely largely illiterate, which may explain the name Bottenhoek, with 'bot' resembling 'illiterate,' though this interpretation remains controversial.

The area was also referred to as Pladyshoek, probably named after the Pladys family who lived in Deerlijk, or, as suggested by Guido Gezelle, after the fish Pladijs, which was consumed by people experiencing poverty in Medieval times, possibly alluding to the impoverished residents of the forest before the Spanish era.

By the 1700s, the name Keyselberg also appears.[3]

It is conceivable that the hill of Saint Louis was called Monte Queso by the Spanish who governed the area from 1556, perhaps due to the presence of cattle farmers producing cheese or because the clay soil reminded them of cheese. The term Queso closely aligns with the old phrase Keese in Keesebeerch, mentioned in 1572, and may have been later reinterpreted as Keyselberg.

The establishment of the church of Saint Louis in Deerlijk, as depicted in Figures 50.2, is the culmination of three significant phases better understood after reading Chapter 34.10.3.

The origins of the parish's choice of the name Saint Louis remain unknown. A plausible theory emerges from the early history of the chapel.

In 1666, a chapel was founded for the Immaculate. The following year marked the beginning of the Devolution War, described in Chapter 8.12 and Chapter 34.10. Notably, there was an attack on Kortrijk on July 13, 1667, and King Louis XIV of France stayed one night in Harelbeke on August 29, 1667. The French army utilized former Spanish barracks, as detailed in Chapter 29.12, near Overacker at Harelbeke along the Beveren Creek, just south of the town.

The French headquarters where Louis XIV slept were between Harelbeke town and Kortrijk.

The Spanish troops, followed by the French, retreated to Ghent, a military stronghold housing the famous Spaniard Castle. This retreat likely followed the Leie River, proceeding inland to Deinze and Ghent, or via Oudenaarde to Deinze and Ghent. One of the inland routes from Harelbeke to the Deinze-Oudenaarde region passed by the Keyselberg hill in Deerlijk (present-day Saint Louis)

Figure 50.2: Saint Louis, or Sint Lodewijk, in Deerlijk, represents the suburb where the author established his roots following his birth in Kortrijk in 1975. This locale was the nucleus of his existence, around which his universe revolved. His intimate familiarity with every street, corner, and resident underscored his deep connection to the area.
However, marital discord between his parents, exacerbated by the interference of his paternal aunts, necessitated a temporary relocation to the center of Deerlijk, specifically to Leon Defraeyeplein. This tumultuous period accelerated the author's maturation, compelling him to assume adult responsibilities and make autonomous life decisions by the tender age of nine.
It was at this juncture that the author's granduncle, Pierre Vangheluwe, extended a life-altering invitation. This pivotal moment marked a transformative chapter in the author's life, as Pierre stepped into the role of a foster father, providing a nurturing environment that fostered the author's academic and personal growth.
Amidst these changes, the author's relationships with his biological parents remained steadfast and positive. In fact, the author was fortunate to have the support and guidance of not just two but four parental figures, including his foster father, Pierre Vangheluwe.
The compilation illustrates the interior of the Saint Louis Church, offering a glimpse into the author's spiritual and communal experiences. Additionally, it features views of the church from various childhood vantage points frequented during his walks and bicycle rides. The collection further includes scenes from Pladijsstraat, the site of the original chapel, Church Square, Kapellestraat, among other significant locales.

and extended to Oudenaarde, then to Ghent, or alternatively to Deinze and from Deinze to Ghent.

The French military's advance towards Ghent was marked by rapid progress. In June 1667, Turenne's French army captured Tournai, Aath, and Charleroi. By July, they had taken Douai. On August 17, 1667, Lille fell to the French. Another French contingent captured Sint Winoksbergen and Veurne in June 1667, and in July, they secured Kortrijk, as illustrated in Figures 50.3, 50.4, and 50.5, and Oudenaarde. By September 1667, the French had advanced to Aalst.

The Spanish defenders of Kortrijk, unable to resist 10000 French troops, retreated towards Harelbeke. From Harelbeke, they further withdrew to the better-protected Ghent, pursued by the French. The numerous burials at the Spanish castle of Ghent during this period suggest significant losses due to malice.

The precise details of the early chapel's history are not documented. Still, it is plausible that the local inhabitants, seeking protection, dedicated their chapel to Saint Louis, a royal predecessor of King Louis XIV. This dedication may have occurred when the King stayed at Harelbeke and passed by the area en route to Oudenaarde, or perhaps the chapel already housed a statue or image of Saint Louis. Believing in a miraculous intervention that spared them destruction, the locals may have attributed their safety to Saint Louis, notably a French. This belief might have been reinforced a few years later when the Castellany of Kortrijk came under French control in 1667, while Ghent remained Spanish.

The French captured fortified Ghent in 1678, which likely felt like a permanent shift to the locals. However, unexpectedly, the French withdrew from Ghent and returned the area, including the castellany of Kortrijk, to Spanish control in 1679. This sudden change might have been perceived as another miracle attributed to Saint Louis.

Unaware of the broader geopolitical stakes, the locals did not realize that France's withdrawal was part of a larger strategy to consolidate its global position through the Peace of Nijmegen.

Although the exact origins of Saint Louis' adoration in Deerlijk are unclear, this theory remains plausible.

The third significant phase in the church's development occurred much later, with the replacement of the chapel by an actual church.

A chapel was initially constructed in Saint Louis on September 30, 1666, by Adriaen Andries, son of Wautier, and his wife Joanna D'Hondt from Kortrijk, to honor Our Lady Immaculate. The location was described as,

'op de plaets ghenaempt den Pladijshoek up het uiterste van Derlick.'

It was intended for the worship of,

'den dienst van de onbevlekt ontfanghenisse van H. moeder Godts Maria.'

The chapel was situated at the north corner of Kapelstraat and Kerkstraat.

By 1747, the chapel appeared on maps as Capelle te Keijselbergh.

The chapel was enlarged in 1777, closed during the French era in 1797, and reopened in 1802.

According to records in Derlike[4], Adriaen Andries, a bailiff in Kortrijk born on February 2, 1606, was a blauwverver in Kortrijk, operating a business that dyed clothes with indigo dye. This process was economically significant, as textile dyeing was essential for refurbishing costly textiles, and black dye was commonly used for mourning attire. Adriaen Andries married Johanna D'Hondt on January 27, 1631. He died on May 20, 1670, and was buried in the church of Saint Martin in Kortrijk. His brother, Oste, was a Recollet monk in Ghent, and his son became a Canon at the Notre Dame church in Kortrijk. Adriaen Andries inherited properties in Deerlijk in 1652, where he constructed the chapel. The establishment records date back to September 30, 1666, with a subsequent record on August 27, 1668.

His baptism record corroborates his lineage as a grandson of Adriaen Andries and indicates connections to Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Antoni Desclergue (DC07).

Chapter 29.8.7 recollects the connections between the Desclergues and Andries. Chapter 34.13 also exposed contacts between Andries and Declercq through Beatrice's ancestors, Antoni's wife.

More connections are given in Chapter 50.3.

50.3 Connections with the Desclergues

The hypothesis that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) played a role in the construction of the chapel at Sint Lodewijk in Deerlijk is not only intriguing but also a fascinating avenue for exploration. While grounded in several indicative elements, the following discussion needs more definitive evidence.

Nevertheless, such churches and chapels often carry with them a layer of mystical history, suggesting a potential, albeit unverified, involvement, in this case, of Desclergue. This speculation invites readers to consider the possibility of his influence, sparking a sense of curiosity and wonder.

The chapel's establishment may have involved Antoni Desclergue (DC06), possibly in collaboration or under his advisement, with the intention of honoring his father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). This hypothesis, while intriguing, rests on the assumption that Jeroni (DC05) was born exactly 100 years before the chapel's establishment—an assumption that remains unconfirmed due to the lack of precise birth records. Jeroni's birth around that time, while plausible, remains speculative, adding a sense of mystery to the narrative.

The references within the chapel to Saint Anna and Saint Rochus are characteristic of Deerlijk, and the original name 'the Immaculate' likely stemmed from Adriaen Andries and his wife. This naming could be linked to the fact that 500 years before 1666, Emperor Manuel Komnenos had elevated the celebration of the Immaculate Conception to an official Catholic holiday.

Despite this, the potential signs pointing to Antoni (DC06) and his father, Jeroni (DC05), add a layer of wonder to the narrative, inviting readers to delve deeper into these potential influences and connections.

The Manor of Overacker (Harelbeke) supported the Spanish military towards the end of the 16th century and in the first half of the 17th century by providing land for military barracks. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his brother Miguel (DC06b) were inhabitants of this manor by their mother, Felipa de Montoya, and their stepfather, Jan Declercq (DK03), as detailed in Chapter 34.13.7. The manor owned lands in several locations within Deerlijk, some of which were near the Chapel at Saint Louis, though the exact properties owned by the Desclergue family are unknown.

Examining Jeroni Desclergue's (DC05) connections, particularly in Chapter 29.8.7, reveals ties with several prominent families, including the Andries family. Church records from Kortrijk in 1591 and 1593 demonstrate Jeroni's association with the family of Adriaen Andries, the uncle of the Adriaen Andries who established the Chapel at Saint Louis in Deerlijk in 1666.

The historical figure Saint Louis, King Louis IX of France, was the son of Blanca de Castilla and Louis VIII le Lion. Blanca de Castilla was the daughter of Alfonso VIII de Castilla. Alfonso, born in Soria in 1188, connects intriguingly with Du Guesclin, a historical figure who resided in Soria in 1360, as discussed in Chapter 19.26.

The Desclergue family originates from Montblanc, making the veneration of Saint Louis in Spain not necessarily an indication of admiration for France.

The original Chapel at Saint Louis measured 31 feet long and 13 feet wide, dimensions noted by Guido Gezelle and referenced in Derlike.[5] Assuming these measurements used local feet rather than Castilian feet, one could whimsically interpret this as evidence of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his son (DC07)'s involvement. The numerals '1' and '3' could correspond to 'A' and 'C' in the Latin alphabet, albeit this remains speculative. Notably, the chapel was established on September 30, the day of Saint Hieronymus. Moreover, the chapel's orientation towards Ostend, where Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) died in 1604, and the subsequent construction of the modern church parallel to the original chapel, both pointing towards Ostend, are remarkable facts.

These observations, while not proving Desclergue's involvement, suggest potential allegiances. The precise role of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) in these events remains elusive, leaving us with intriguing possibilities rather than definitive conclusions.

The Island of Sri Lanka, Pearl of the Indian Ocean

For anyone delving into the history of Sri Lanka, the diversity and quality of available sources pose a significant challenge. It's crucial to note that there are three primary types of historical works in Sri Lanka. The first type, often viewed through the lens of the uninformed Westerner, tends to assume that Sri Lanka's history began with the arrival of the Portuguese.

These sources, while acknowledging the existence of pre-Portuguese inhabitants, often portray them as uncultivated, focusing on their religious beliefs in certain gods or the Lord Buddha. This underscores the need for critical evaluation of historical sources.

On the opposite end of the spectrum, the second type of source places Sri Lanka at the center of the universe, asserting that it was an exceptionally advanced cultural society.

For those with a genuine interest in history, a third category of sources proves more valuable. These are works based on archaeology, historical records, and the broader context of global history, particularly along the coasts of the Indian Ocean. These sources, unlike the first two types, provide a more accurate understanding of Sri Lankan history, highlighting the importance of these types of sources in historical analysis.

However, there remains to be a quality problem. A considerable amount of literature on Sri Lanka is authored by individuals who need to be more educated or highly biased, resulting in imaginative but factually deficient works. Some authors may deeply understand Sri Lanka but need knowledge of the wider world. This leads to egregious errors when placing Sri Lanka within a global framework.

Consulting high-quality works reveals that Sri Lanka has a vibrant history that is far from isolated. Numerous waves of trade, cultural exchanges, invasions, and alliances characterize the Island's history. Regarding Sri Lanka as a unified nation, whether genetically or culturally, would be inaccurate. The term that best describes Sri Lanka is diversity, which is immediately apparent in its languages and religions. What unites Sri Lankans is that they all inhabit the same beautiful Island.

Anthropologists and geneticists alike recognize the diversity of Sri Lanka's population. The faces of Sri Lankans reflect a mixture of European, East Asian, Arabian, Persian, Afghan, Indian, and Veddha ancestries.

The Veddhas, the Island's original inhabitants, are classified as aboriginal tribes, similar to those found on the Nicobar Islands, Andaman Islands, Timor, and Australia. They form the Island's genetic foundation, which has since been enriched by numerous waves of DNA from other parts of the world, primarily India. This genetic diversity is evidence of Sri Lanka's long and dynamic history.

It's important to clarify for the non-Sri Lankan reader that Sri Lanka has historically not been a single nation but an island comprising several countries or Kingdoms. When the Portuguese allied with Sri Lanka, their primary alliances were with the Kingdoms of Kotte and Jaffna, the most significant kingdoms at the time from the perspective of global trade. The relationship between Portugal and Kotte, for instance, was not purely colonial domination but a form of integration. Sri Lankan women were considered ideal marriage partners by the Portuguese men who arrived on the Island without bringing brides from their homeland.

This understanding of the political structure of Sri Lanka is crucial for a comprehensive understanding of its history.

The term 'colonization' is a modern concept that became relevant after the Dutch East India Company (VOC) period, implying a superior power governing a subordinate race. The VOC viewed their overseas territories as manufacturing and trading entities, while the post-VOC era was characterized by racial domination.

In contrast, the Portuguese regarded their overseas areas as independent feudal counties ruled by a king but considered no less respectable than other counties in the Iberian Peninsula or Europe. The King of Portugal was seen as the highest-in-rank feudal lord, but the people were viewed as equals within the human society. Some islanders held higher ranks than the Portuguese, while others were of lower grades, similar to the social structure in Portugal. The Island's surplus income was sent to the King of Portugal as tax, akin to the taxes paid by other Portuguese counties. In return, the Portuguese protected their territories from foreign invasions.

Furthermore, as indicated, the Portuguese intermarried with local women, and their descendants were considered Portuguese. Initially, this mestizo population was not deemed inferior by the mainland nobility, although such perceptions may have evolved later.

The characteristic feature of the Island's inhabitants is their recurrent response to dissatisfaction with a ruler by inviting another ruler. This pattern persisted into the twentieth century; when the British left the Island, the Sri Lankans sought Soviet influence, and later, they turned to China for economic support.

Sri Lanka can resist such external influences if guided by a long-term vision. A focus on maximizing the Island's educational potential and harnessing its natural resources—such as wind, solar, and oceanic energy—could significantly bolster its self-sufficiency. The agricultural capacity of Sri Lanka is sufficient to sustain the entire nation without reliance on imports. Additionally, its strategic location along critical global trade routes should secure substantial revenue without the necessity of ceding control of its harbors to foreign entities.

Before the Portuguese arrived, the Island experienced numerous invasions where one ruler overthrew another, often resulting in significant loss of life.

The latter part of the 20th century saw heightened polarization within the country due to attempts at unification, leading to the emergence of Sinhalese and Tamil nationalism and, ultimately, a protracted and bloody civil war. True unification lies in embracing the Island's diversity—not merely as two distinct populations but as a mosaic of hundreds of tribes, castes, religions, and dialects. It is imperative to downplay these distinctions and foster a shared identity rooted in the commonality of living on and loving the Island.

A rudimentary understanding of history might lead Western readers to erroneously believe that the Portuguese 'discovered' the Island several centuries ago. This notion needs to be revised and supported by informed historians. The Portuguese discovered the maritime route to India and Sri Lanka around Africa, but the lands bordering the Indian Ocean were already well-known to them.

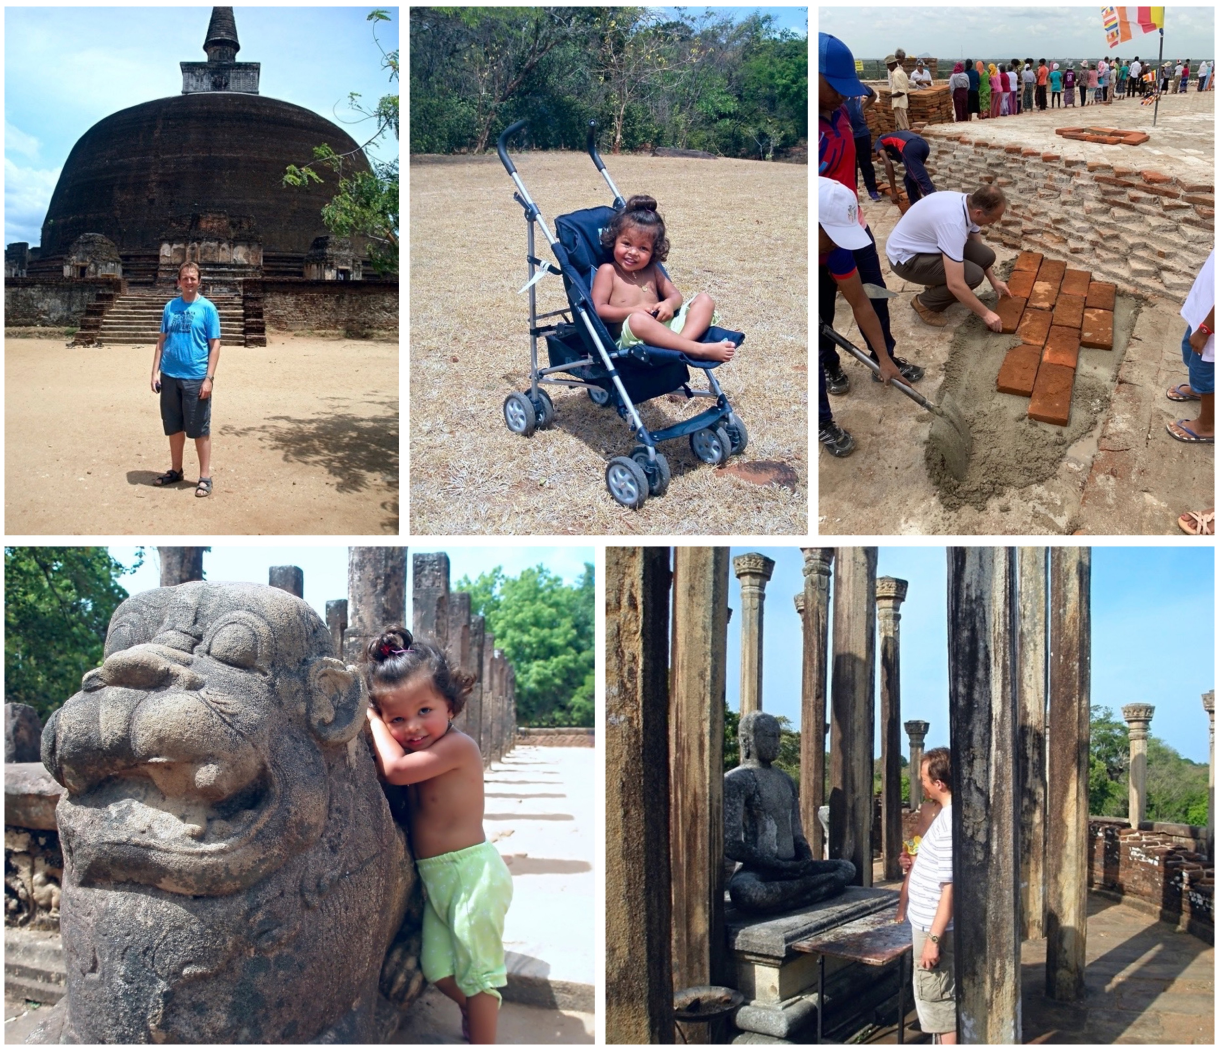

Figure 51.1: *The author visited Anuradhapura and Polonnaruwa several times, even as a child. Here, a stupa is seen in 2007 at Polonnaruwa, and the author's daughter, Anna-Laura, also enjoyed the site. Note that Sri Lankans primarily built constructions out of wood. Structures of significant importance, such as temples, usually had stone pillars, which were the ones that survived. In another picture, the author laid bricks on the new Pagoda of Anuradhapura in 2019, 34 years after his first visit to the country and 22 years after his wedding to a Sri Lankan. Figure 51.3: Since 1985, the author has visited Sri Lanka numerous times. This picture was taken at St John's Maha Vidyalaya College in Kalutara in 1986. At that time, the author was very much into learning the Sinhala language. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 51.4: Sri Lanka would not have chilies if it were not for the Spanish. The peppers were brought back to Spain from Mexico and spread quickly all over Iberia and the Mediterranean, including the Spanish and Portuguese territories such as Sri Lanka. The image shows the most famous varieties still found in Mexico, most of which also exist in Sri Lanka.

Indeed, Ptolemy included a relatively accurate depiction of Sri Lanka on his world map in the second century.

Sri Lankan historians have valid reasons to believe in ancient trade connections with the Mediterranean, supported by evidence such as the presence of cinnamon in ancient Egyptian sites. A well-developed trade network stretched from Persia to Cambodia, intersecting with Sri Lanka and underscoring its historical significance in commerce, culture, and religion.

Nevertheless, these trade routes likely involved indirect exchanges where goods passed through multiple hands before reaching destinations like the Mediterranean.

In their quest for evidence, historians sometimes overreach, making dubious claims that Sri Lanka was the fabled Atlantis or Tarshish. These assertions often begin as speculative possibilities, then morph into probabilities and, eventually, false certainties.

The primary challenge is that Sri Lanka's history is interconnected with global narratives, yet only some specialists possess comprehensive expertise in all relevant areas.

On-site archaeological research and local scholars' study of written sources form the backbone of Sri Lankan historiography. These findings require further scholarly examination to build a more robust understanding.

Early historical texts, primarily authored during the British colonial period, often need proper referencing despite their detailed accounts. This omission might have been acceptable in that era but could have been more satisfactory for modern readers who demand substantiated claims.

Nevertheless, we must work with the available resources. While not exhaustive, contemporary historical texts adopt a more scientific methodology. Anton Sebastian's book, A Complete Illustrated History of Sri Lanka,[1] is a commendable effort, though it lacks depth. Despite this, it covers the entirety of Sri Lankan history and is thus praiseworthy. The foreword of Sebastian's book reads:

'Dedicated to the present and future generations of Sri Lanka in the hope that this book may awaken them to the realities of the past, challenges of the future, and bring a closer understanding and harmony between the communities, so that they may stand together in restoring the glory and the integrity of the island.'

However, Sebastian does not specify the period he envisions in the final part of his statement. One hopes he refers to the era preceding the Civil War rather than a distant, idealized past that never truly existed.

Historically, the Island has always been home to multiple polities.

Glorifying a particular period invariably undermines others and fails to achieve its intended purpose. The continuous intermingling of peoples over centuries means that no one in Sri Lanka today can claim pure descent from any historical population, be it from the Polonnaruwa, shown in Figure 51.1, Anuradhapura, shown in Figure 51.1, or Kandyan Kingdom in Figure 51.2.

This manuscript references several other standard works on Sri Lankan history.[2][3] The theories of Dr. Tuan M. Zameer Careem Khan, a Sri Lankan of recent Afghan (Pashtun) descent, exemplify the scientific rigor needed in this field. Dr. Khan's meticulous documentation and insightful analysis elevate historical scholarship and highlight the necessity of detailed and precise historical research. The Colombo Telegraph has recently featured his work, emphasizing its importance and potential to advance our understanding of Sri Lanka's complex past.

Here, we primarily focus on the history of the de Silva family in Sri Lanka.

Over the past 400 years, numerous indigenous alliances have shaped our lineage. A comprehensive history would ideally include descriptions from the earliest periods; however, due to time constraints, our efforts are to trace the paternal ancestry line's arrival from Portugal and Goa to the Island. Readers can refer to other scholarly works for a detailed study of the Island's ancient history.

Sri Lanka's history is complex and lengthy, with a filled prehistoric period followed by Indo-Aryan invasions that preceded the Anuradhapura period, traditionally dated from 377 BC to 1017 AD. The subsequent Polonnaruwa period spans from 1056 to 1232 AD. The era from 1232 until 1505 is often termed a transitional period, a label as misapplied as the Middle Ages.

This period saw the rise of numerous island kingdoms, including the Jaffna and Kotte Kingdoms. The segmentation of historical periods, particularly from the 13th century onwards, is heavily influenced by modern nationalistic thought and warrants qualified scholars re-examining. A nuanced understanding of Sri Lanka's history, embracing its diversity and complexity, is essential. Simplistic approaches need to capture the true nature of an island at the crossroads of global interactions.

Zameer Careem Khan, a Sri Lankan of recent Afghan (Pashtun) descent and hopes many Sri Lankan historians will elevate their knowledge and scientific approach to Dr Khan's level. Persons like him bring science to the next stage. Dr Khan also describes many facts the author discovered and has an excellent memory to pinpoint exact facts and examples to support his theories. The Colombo Telegraph recently reported on his work

[3] Tanmaya Das, 'Story of the Last Ceylonese Afghans and Their Struggle to Survive,' Colombo Telegraph, November 3, 2020

In this book, we focus on Sri Lanka's genealogical history, specifically during the Portuguese period. However, it will become evident that Sri Lanka's history is deeply embedded within a broader context of global trade and influence, extending far beyond the Portuguese era. The Island's historical significance was recognized by great powers such as the Persians, Greeks, and Chinese, and later by the Arabians and the people of Malacca.

When the Portuguese arrived, they entered a world interconnected through the Arabian Sea with the Arabian Peninsula and beyond. Spices and goods from India and Sri Lanka were known in Europe, albeit expensive and largely inaccessible due to blocked trade routes.

The Portuguese arrival disrupted these monopolies, introducing another religion to Southeast Asia's diverse landscape. It is a misconception to view Southeast Asians as well-paid for their goods or independent before the Portuguese arrival; Sri Lanka had already endured trade monopolies imposed by other nations long before European contact. Before European colonization, the Island was neither a Heaven nor a Paradise.

Before delving into our narrative on the Garden of Eden, as Ceylon is often referred to, we introduce a linguistic notion to illustrate the cultural exchanges that have enriched the Island.

For instance, the Sinhalese word for ship, Nave, is of Portuguese origin, exemplifying the linguistic influences absorbed over centuries.

Sinhalese, a highly cultivated and ancient language, has incorporated multiple foreign elements. The author, having studied the language to some extent during childhood and again in 1997, acknowledges the time and opportunity constraints that have limited deeper exploration, with hopes to continue in retirement.

This study aims to provide a nuanced understanding of the de Silva family's place within Sri Lanka's rich historical tapestry, acknowledging the broader global influences that have shaped the Island's past.

Chapter 52

Greeks in Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka has a notable cohort of esteemed academics, either hailing from the country or possessing Sri Lankan heritage, who have produced exceptional literary works and scholarly articles about certain epochs within Sri Lankan history.

There are signs suggesting the presence of Greek influence in the historical context of Sri Lanka; however, the author has yet to come across any scholarly work that effectively synthesizes and consolidates these discoveries.

However, several writers of lesser expertise posit a potential Greek link without substantiating their claims with concrete evidence, relying only on the fact that Alexander the Great ventured into India and that certain Indian tribes still adhere to a religious tradition that exhibits ties to Greece.

The author posits that a thorough investigation of place names in Sri Lanka by highly knowledgeable researchers competent in ancient Greek may provide significant evidence connecting the Island with ancient Greek civilization. This proposition is based on the existence of an old map associated with Ptolemy, which is believed to portray Sri Lanka.

The author's study was not conducted with a high level of thoroughness, and their proficiency in Greek is lacking. Nevertheless, the individual discovered evidence that potentially establishes a connection between the location of significance mentioned in this literary work and the ancient Greek civilization.

The town of Kalutara potentially derives its name from Greek origins, signifying a 'beautiful marvel' (is beautiful; is marvel). On the other hand, the name Horana may have been bestowed upon it due to its association with a military outpost situated along the access ridge connecting the coastal region to the hill country (v denotes a military post and incorporates the term). The locality known as Diagama close to the Kalu Ganga River might got its name from the Greek term , denoting 'through.' Similarly, the Kalu Ganga River, often believed to be called after the Sinhala word kalu for 'black,' could have been bestowed with this appellation due to its association with the Greek word , meaning 'beautiful.'

The location known as Uduwara, where the Portuguese constructed a fortification to oversee the Kalu Ganga River, whose source is located at Adam's Peak, shown in Figure 52.1, maybe derived its name from a comparable purpose it previously served, namely as a vantage point for seeing the river (is to observe the road).

It is possible that the name Colombo may have been derived from the Greek language, maybe about the renowned Sri Lankan Sweetlip fish, shown in Figure 52.2 and scientifically known as Plectorhinchus ceylonensis in Latin or referred to as Boraluwaa in Sinhala. The term , or grunts, refers to the fish species that are considered holy to Hermes due to the grunting sound it produces. On the other hand, signifies sustenance, food, or culinary preparation. Hence, it is plausible that the ancient Greeks referred to the location where they engaged in fishing activities or procured Sweetlip fish as . Modern scholars typically assume that the name Colombo is derived from Sinhalese words referring to 'the harbor of the Kelani River,' coming from Kolon Totha. Still, it would be weird that the word Totha in other places remained (such as Hambantota) while it was absorbed in the word Colombo. It is, therefore, doubtful that the origins of Colombo are to be found in the word Tota.

Persistent rumors in Sri Lanka suggest that Alexander the Great may have visited Adam's Peak. Through "The Island Saturday Magazine (Colombo) of 4 January 2003" and the author S.S.M. Nanayakkara, it is possible to provide a condensed overview of the available narratives.

Sri Pada, often referred to as Adam's Peak in early Western accounts, has been a prominent feature from prehistoric times, predating the documented history of the Island. Legends pertaining to the revered mount existed before the advent of the Christian period. The act of worshiping deities in elevated locations has been a fundamental practice among human beings from ancient times. Throughout history, elevated and remote locations have been regarded with profound reverence and admiration, particularly in early religious practices centered on nature worship. The cult maintained its presence within the pagan society until the early periods of Greek and Roman civilizations and continued to exist even in subsequent eras. As a result, Mount Olympus in Greece was consecrated as a sacred site for worshiping the Greek pantheon.

To this day, the Tibetans and Nepalese continue to hold Chomolungma, which translates to 'Goddess Mother of the World' in Tibetan, along with many other peaks in the Himalayan range, including the iconic Mount Everest, in high reverence. According to historical records, during the renowned 1953 expedition to Mount Everest, Norkay Tensing and his fellow Sherpa companions, who accompanied Edmund Hillary, engaged in a ceremonial offering of sustenance to the revered mountain deity Chomolungma. This ceremonial gesture was performed to seek the deity's favor and bestow blessings upon the expedition, ultimately contributing to its triumphant outcome. Hillary buried a miniature crucifix bestowed upon him by Colonel John Hunt, the esteemed commander. The persistence of tradition is formidable.

It is widely claimed that Alexander the Great, the renowned Greek warrior king and empire builder from Macedon, visited Sri Pada about 324 B.C. when the Peak was already highly revered. Following his conquest of the Persian kingdom and its dependents, Alexander led his military troops into India, crossing the Indus River and reaching the historic city of Taxila. Finally, Porus, the Indian monarch, with his contingent of well-trained war elephants, successfully confronted him. The Greek cavalry encountered these giant creatures, which posed a daunting and terrible challenge because of their unfamiliarity. The horses, overwhelmed by fear, initiated a stampede and proceeded to disperse in unmanageable distress. Due to concerns of potential rebellion within his army, Alexander strategically decided to negotiate with Porus, addressing his generals' representation.

Following his encounter with the Indian monarch, Alexander, driven by a sense of restlessness, decided to deviate from his original path and go down the southwestern coast of India. He intended to explore the southern regions since he had been informed of the existence of the remarkable Island of Sri Lanka, referred to by the ancient Greeks as Taprobane. The user was drawn to rumors about the holy hill of Sri Pada, which was once devoted to the Hindu god Saman and referred to as Samanthakuty. The summit, with its prominent top offering a captivating view, was irresistible to Alexander, who was driven by his desire for pleasure.

The subject of discussion pertains to ancient artifacts. In his literary work titled 'Zaffer Namah Skendari,' Ashraff, a Persian poet and chronicler from the 15th century, provides a detailed account of Alexander the Great's journey to Sri Pada. Upon arrival on the Island, the individual proceeds to engage in lavish festivities and debauchery with his entourage, embarking on exploring the Island's marvels. Alexander is said to have enlisted the aid of Bolinas, a renowned Greek philosopher, occultist, and magician, in his endeavor to ascend the revered summit that several divine beings believed to be vigilantly protected.

One of the methods used to scale the almost unattainable summit was the utilization of substantial iron chains fastened to stanchions composed of the same metallic material, which were securely attached to the exposed surface of the rock. The chains were affixed to the stanchions using iron and bronze rivets. The remnants of these artifacts are still extant. The first pilgrims who ascended to the top relied on the aid of these chains to elevate themselves to the summit.

The notion of Alexander's arrival to Sri Pada predates Ashraff's time. Ibn Batuta, a renowned 14th-century pilgrim traveler from Tangiers in Morocco, embarked on a journey to the Island where he visited the revered climb. During his trip, he saw a grotto situated at the base of the Peak, with the inscription Iskander. The titles Iskander and Skendari used by Ashraff are synonymous since they pertain to the renowned historical figure Alexander the Great. According to Batuta's memories, the ancient individuals created stairs on the vertical rock surface. These steps are equipped with iron stanchions and hanging chains, allowing pilgrims to go to the summit conveniently and with reduced hazards. The manifestation of the Divine's foot is discernible on a dark and towering boulder situated in an unobstructed area at the Peak.

Except for limited and delayed historical accounts from Arab sources, there is a notable absence of information spanning more than seventeen centuries on Alexander's visit to the Island and his expedition to Sri Pada. The lack of mention of it in the Great Dynastic Chronicle Mahawamsa or other notable historical records is evident. The focal point of Alexander's endeavors mostly revolved around Persia and its empire. Consequently, the tales and traditions of the ancient Persians were naturally transmitted to their Arab descendants.

Regarding the ancient artifacts found in Sri Pada, Robert Percival, an Englishman stationed with the British army in Colombo during the early 19th century, provides his observations.

The iron chains affixed to the rock face of Adam's Peak exhibit characteristics suggestive of an ancient origin. The identity of the individuals responsible for their installation and the intended objective behind their placement is a matter of considerable uncertainty and eludes conclusive determination. The indigenous population's beliefs and superstitions pose challenges. The available data strongly suggests that the Peak had garnered significant attention prior to the documented historical period of the Island.

Chapter 53

Fortresses and Settlements in Goa and Sri Lanka and the Appearance of Iberian Names

53.1 Introduction

Self-explanatory images are presented in Figures 53.2, 53.3, 53.4, 53.5, 53.6, 53.7, 53.8, 53.9 and 53.10.

A report to the King of Kotte upon the arrival of Don Lorenço de Almeida and the Portuguese states:

'There is in our harbor of Colombo a race of people fair of skin and comely withal. They don jackets of iron and hats of iron; they rest not a minute in one place; they walk here and there; they eat hunks of stone and drink blood; they give two or three pieces of gold and silver for one fish or one lime; the report of their cannon is louder than thunder when it bursts upon the rock 'Yugandhara.' Their cannon balls fly many a 'gawwa' and shatter fortresses of granite.'

This citation can be found in Rajavaliya 73 and was also reported by M. D. Raghavan[1].

The most substantial Karava conversion from Buddhism and Hinduism to Christianity occurred in 1556. Over 70000 Careas and their Pantagatim (i.e., their leader) from seaport areas along the southwest coast of Sri Lanka were converted and baptized by the San Francisco missionaries.

Under the guidance of Friar Francisco de Chaves, they formed a religious order, receiving applause from King Dom João III of Portugal. This event occurred during the tenure of Afonço Pereyra de Lacerda, the Captain of Ceylon, sent by the Viceroy Dom Pedro Mascarenhas.

M. D. Raghavan[2] notes that following this example, many more Karava and Salagama inhabitants from the Kotte Kingdom, including the king, converted to Christianity. Their good relationship with the King of Kandy and their Christian faith made them loyal either to the Portuguese, the King of Kandy, or both. Consequently, during conflicts, they alternated their allegiance between the Kandyan King and the Portuguese.

The ease of conversion to Christianity might be attributed to the Karava and Salagama not being deeply embedded in the Sri Lankan caste system. At that time, being recent newcomers, they enjoyed greater social freedom. However, by the end of the Portuguese rule and definitively during the VOC period, the Karava and Salagama became more strictly integrated into the caste system.

This was necessitated by the colonial economic structure, which required individuals to belong to specific groups with designated roles, such as fishermen or cinnamon cultivators.

Raghavan mentions several known Patangatim in Sri Lanka from that era, some bearing Portuguese names. The standard interpretation is that these Patangatim were Sinhalese who received Portuguese names during baptism. While this is often true, it is not universally the case. DNA analysis would be required to confirm such claims. Examples include Dom Gaspar de Cruz, Afonço Pereira, Don Simao, and Thome Rodriguez.

Raghavan also references a particular soldier, Antonio Barreto, who became the guardian of Dona Catherina, Queen of Kandy. The Queen adopted a Christian first name, while the soldier had a Portuguese first name and surname, suggesting potential Portuguese descent.

Upon their arrival in Sri Lanka, the Portuguese brought with them a long-standing tradition of naming children, which had significant social implications. Typically, an individual received one or more Christian names, serving as first names or given names, in addition to the family name, which was generally passed down from father to child.

Figure 53.1: Business class travel may offer comfort, but to truly experience a country, one must embrace a more modest mode of travel. In 2008, the author embarked on an extraordinary train journey through India, visiting esteemed institutions from Nepal to the southernmost parts of the country. Notable among these were the University of Allahabad, Banaras Hindu University (Varanasi), the Indian Institute of Technology Madras (Chennai), and the Indian Institute of Science (Bangalore). A profound respect for ancient cultures and history is essential for nurturing the next generation of global engineers and scientists. The Indian Institute of Science in Bangalore, where C.V. Raman was the first director, stands as a beacon of scientific achievement. Raman is renowned for the Raman Effect, which has become fundamental in modern Raman spectrometers. His collaborative work with Nagendra Nath in the field of Acousto-Optics further underscores his contributions to science. The Taj Mahal, depicted in Figure 4.2 on page 20, epitomizes the convergence of history, culture, religion, science, and engineering. While the world boasts many beautiful landmarks, the Taj Mahal and the Alhambra in Granada stand unparalleled in its splendor. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Occasionally, the family name could also be transmitted from mother to child, especially if the mother's family name was of higher nobility. This naming tradition, with its European influence, played a role in shaping individual identities and social structures during the Portuguese colonial period.

Historical sources consistently report that when a person was baptized and converted, they adopted the full name of their godfather or godmother. They would precede their name with Dom or Dona if of sufficiently high social status.

Initially, only the first names (e.g., Diego, Catarina) were adopted, but later family names were included as well. This practice became particularly prevalent after 1553, when the Kingdom of Kotte became a vassal state of Portugal. Consequently, possessing a Portuguese family name does not necessarily indicate Portuguese ancestry along the paternal bloodline. A DNA test would be required to confirm or refute Portuguese lineage.

However, it can be assumed that nearly every Sri Lankan has, in one ancestral branch or another, at least one Portuguese, Spanish, or other European ancestor, highlighting the country's complex and diverse cultural heritage.

How did individual children in Sri Lanka acquire Portuguese family names when it was not the result of conversion? The answer is straightforward.

Generally, a child would receive a Portuguese family name if his father was Portuguese or had been given a Portuguese family name. This practice was not restricted to situations where the father and mother were married. Numerous examples in Western baptism certificates from that period show children being baptized and receiving their father's family name, even when the documents indicate that the parents were unmarried, rendering the child illegitimate.

Thus, when a person in contemporary Sri Lanka has a name such as Perera or de Silva, it signifies either a patrilineal ancestor from Portugal or an ancestor who adopted the name upon conversion to Christianity.

Because almost no women arrived from Iberia[3], receiving a Portuguese family name from a mother could have occurred, for instance, in situations where the mother was already a mixed child of a Portuguese father and a Sri Lankan mother.

Sri Lanka is not unique in this matter. The literature on Goa provides further clarification. For instance, Palash Ghosh[4] wrote an insightful article, from which we quote:

'Portugal's long presence in India led to the emergence of 'Luso-Indians,' that is, people of mixed Indian and Portuguese descent, primarily the progeny of Portuguese men and local Indian women. Also, Portugal sent thousands of 'Orfas del Rei' (young female orphans) to India to marry them to Portuguese men or Indians of high social rank. But not all Indians with Portuguese surnames have European blood flowing in their veins. Many Indians, like the ancestors of Indian film starlet Freida Pinto, acquired European names only after converting to Catholicism.'

Regarding Goa, there is also an illuminating article by Gauree Malkarnekar[5] that delves deeper into the origins of Goan family names, which are not always and not necessarily Portuguese. Some family names can be understood by examining pre-Portuguese history, while others originated later.

Interestingly, the article shows that Goans have been quite flexible in their naming conventions. Indeed, new names could be easily adopted when old names were disadvantageous in certain situations, such as during persecution.

Malkarnekar's article also states:

'As far as surnames of Goa's Christian families go, Friar Victor Ferrao, a researcher and dean at the Rachol Seminary, states, 'During the baptism to Christianity, a person of European origin was made the godfather and all those converted would get his name.

In some cases, the village head or 'gaunkar' decided that his village should convert. And there are instances where an entire town has taken the same surname.' Furthermore, he mentions 'that sometimes families did not convert all at once, leading to different members of the same family receiving different Portuguese names.'

During the Portuguese era in Sri Lanka, certain individuals were conferred honorific titles such as Don or Dom. These titles occasionally appear in Sri Lankan family names, either in their original form or appended to the end of the term. Such practices were standard during the VOC period, as the administration and the individuals sought to maintain connections with the former Portuguese rulers.

For example, Shirani de Silva's grandmother, Jeethnona/Jeethdona, exemplifies this phenomenon. As a competitor of the Portuguese, the VOC likely prioritized the rights of Portuguese burghers over those of the general population. Thus, holding or assuming a Portuguese title often indicated close ties with the Portuguese and suggested a higher probability of Portuguese ancestry, even if such ancestry resulted from extramarital relations or love affairs.

A comprehensive DNA analysis of every Sri Lankan would likely yield astonishing results. An experienced traveler can observe the beauty and genetic diversity of the Sri Lankan people, recognizing traits from Europeans, Asians, Indians, and Moors in their appearances.

Unlike regions such as Cuba, there is a noticeable absence of African features, except perhaps those from North-East Africa.

Many individuals still exhibit characteristics reminiscent of tanned Portuguese ancestry.

The Portuguese in Sri Lanka appear to have primarily integrated with families from two specific castes: the Karava caste and the Salagama caste (also known as Saliya or Hali), predominantly found in the regions of Kosgoda, Balapitiya, Negombo, Heenatiyana, Talalla, Rathgama, Dadalla, Matara, Kalutara, and Waskaduwa.

Members of the Karava caste often possess a 'ge-name,' sometimes in conjunction with a Portuguese name. In contrast, individuals from the Salagama caste typically do not have a 'ge-name' but have frequently adopted Portuguese names. These low-country castes (as opposed to hill-country castes) are sometimes referred to as 'the fishermen' for the Karava and the 'Cinnamon farmers' for the Salagama. Such labels are misleading but stem from the historical involvement of many Salagama families in cinnamon cultivation during the Portuguese and the VOC periods.

In contrast, many fishermen at that time were indeed Karava. The Karavas were among the first to encounter the Portuguese and played a role in the marine protection of the country. Yet, it is essential to note that most Karava were not fishermen.

Similarly, misleading generalizations are made about the Goyigama caste. While many Goyigama were farmers and possessed land for cultivation, they often depicted themselves as 'landowners' during the British period to align themselves with British lords.

When assessed through Western standards, the caste system becomes particularly problematic, where differences are immediately perceived as 'better versus worse' or 'higher versus lower.' A more accurate approach would be to acknowledge that people from different castes have distinct family histories, recognizing that mixed marriages were common. Many children were born out of wedlock and assumed to belong to one caste, while their ancestors may have originated from another. In essence, the caste system should be viewed as a cultural phenomenon rather than a value system.[6]

Fortunately, most young people in Sri Lanka today are not well-versed in the caste system and do not consider it a significant factor in choosing marriage partners.[7]

It is noteworthy that many people remain silent about the caste system, either because they are reluctant to disclose their caste or deem it inappropriate to classify individuals.

Over the past century, many families have changed their names to suggest affiliation with a particular caste, which may also contribute to their reticence.

Perhaps they find it inappropriate to discuss such matters with a foreigner. Consequently, gathering information on the subject took a lot of work for this author. Most of the facts this book presents regarding this topic are derived from the literature.

Modern studies on the interactions between the Portuguese and the Sri Lankans can be found in the works of scholars such as Jorge Flores.[8]

Fort Aguada, depicted in Figure 53.7, is a Portuguese fortress completed in 1606. Situated on the northern shore of the Mandovi River in Goa, India, its name means 'water,' referencing the vital water sources at this location essential for provisioning passing ships and warranted protection at all costs. From the fortress, the Portuguese had a strategic vantage point with a clear view of the river mouth, as illustrated in Figure 53.8, enabling them to defend Goa against incoming hostile ships.

Before the construction of Fort Aguada, the Portuguese had established other strongholds, notably those built by Reis Magos and Gasper Dias.

However, in 1604, the Dutch VOC blockaded the Mandovi River with seven ships for a month, employing a strategy similar to the one used to cut off sea access for Antwerp in Belgium. This event shocked the Portuguese, as their cannons at the time, positioned at the existing fortresses, could not reach the Dutch ships. Consequently, Fort Aguada was constructed to ensure the entire mouth of the Mandovi River could be adequately defended.

Chapter 54

Recent Family History of Shirani de Silva

54.1 Introduction

Shirani Olupathage de Silva is first described in Chapter 47.3 as the author's wife. She is equally referred to in the following chapters: Part X as a 't King in-law-descendant; Chapter 64 as granddaughter-in-law of Irma Helena Lesage; Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2 as a great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67 as granddaughter-in-law of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68; Chapter 69 as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71 as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Clemens Lammens; and Chapter 72 as the wife of the author.

In what follows, we focus on the genealogy and family of Shirani with attention to the last handful of generations.

In the opposite direction, in Figure 54.2 and Figure 54.3, the Kalu Ganga is visible up until Kalutara. On a clear day, the rock can be seen from the sea, and vice versa. The hill was easily accessible in the past, and the author regularly visited it when in Sri Lanka, as shown in Figure 54.2.

A small Kapuella (Capela is Portuguese for 'chapel') temple after which the area is named can also be seen from the rock, and also the tomb of Shirani's father Belin de Silva, in Figure 54.5.

Shirani is a granddaughter of Dom Olupathage Perez de Silva (also known as Peiris and Pedro) and Doña Sia Doris Hami on her father's side and of Dom Olupathage Domis de Silva and Doña Demuni Sara Neris Jeeth Hami (also known as Demuni Jeeth-nona) on her mother's side. Domis is a name that was introduced during the VOC period.

She is the daughter of Olupathage Belin de Silva and Olupathage Pia Wetty de Silva (also known as Piyawathie).

Her uncles are Olupathage David, Gilman, and Premachandra, and her auntie is Evelyn. Her brothers are Piyal Losantos (also known as Piyal Lasantha) and Sunil Santos (also known as Sunilsanta). At the same time, her sisters are Chula Wetty (also known as Chulawathie; Chula means handsome in Hispanic dialects), Juanita (also known as Suneeta), and Romani (also known as Ramani).

Shirani has an elder auntie, Olupathage Soma Wetty (also known as Somawathi) de Silva, on her mother's side, who died in 2019.

Shirani descends from the House of de Silva (la casa de Silva) with which one of her Iberian ancestors, namely Carvalho, married. De Silva is an ancient Iberian family in the Kingdom of Portugal where they sometimes appeared as Da Silva, originating from Leon in Spain, later mixed during the Portuguese colonization of Ceylon (Ceilao) with a Singhalese Karava or Salagama caste house called Olupathage and before that at Goa in India.

An etymological study, including archaeological investigations, concluded that the name Olupathage means 'the House of the Heads' and is described in detail in the following chapters. Olupathage was recently given, likely in the 18th century, because it is not widespread. Most persons carrying this name are from the area around Uduwara. The construction after which the name was given is still there.

Both parents are blood-related, which can be seen in the family names in the recent ancestry tree. Indeed, besides the genealogical evidence of this statement and an expectation due to a tradition to marry within the caste, a GEDmatch® analysis was undertaken to find equal segments from each parent. Specifically, on Chromosome 3, a sequence of 12.3 cm was found; on Chromosome 12, a sequence of 8.9 cm was found; on Chromosome 14, a sequence of 11.1 cm was found; on Chromosome 17, a sequence of 21.4 cm was found; and on chromosome 20, a sequence of 17.5 cm was found.

Genealogical research in Sri Lanka is challenging for several reasons, including the Sinhalese language. However, some certificates are in English, Dutch, or Portuguese, depending on the period and the person's preference. DNA, legacy, and archaeology are our fundamental (re)sources. Nevertheless, we have been able to do extensive research on a limited fraction of old administrative documents photographed by the Genealogical Library of Utah,[1] in the 1980s and the 1990s.

We have retrieved fractions of the paternal ancestry line that match the available legacy on paper.

As we go back in time, certificates have deteriorated. They may be stored at different locations, such as the VOC archives in

A chevron on the tombstone, called 'asna' in Portuguese, is a family tradition. The chevron is a Greek 'Lambda' and represents 'Lusiàdas,' which means 'Portuguese.' For instance, the symbol also appears in the Portuguese Marine Corps' coat of arms, established in 1614. The appearance of rounded corners is also a Portuguese tradition of the 17th century. The grave of Vasco Da Gama, for instance, has it too. Also, at Goa, rounded corners and ornaments are standard on the old Portuguese graves. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

Jakarta, the Portuguese archives at Goa, and the Portuguese archives in Spain.

Note that almost all Portuguese files of the Estado da India Portuguesa period, stored in Portugal, have disappeared in a fire.

The investigations were fascinating because they are consistent with the knowledge that the family is an old Chalia family of Uduwara and that the name Olupathage originated locally.

Interestingly, the Olupathage clan consisted of de Silva's and Fernandes, Perrera, and Reis. There were also cases without Portuguese surnames. We, therefore, assume that every Olupathage family originates from families at and around the Uduwara fortress. The collection of these specific names associated with the clan name of Olupathage is almost direct evidence that the earliest clan members originated from Goa in India, with Portuguese roots, except those without Portuguese surnames. Indeed, these Portuguese names, in particular, are much more common in Goa than in Sri Lanka.

Thanks to a family tradition, we know the most recent generations of the family tree in reasonable detail. On-site genealogy has provided us with, as far as possible, a few registration certificates for confirmation. Later research, if more documents surface, may add more details or make minor corrections. Summaries are given in Figures 54.7 and 54.8.

The earliest documented ancestor at Uduwara, found in recent history, was Olupathage Don Andres (I) de Silva.

Earlier generations at Uduwara must have appeared in documents during the VOC and Portuguese periods, but those documents have been lost or have yet to surface.

Olupathage Don Andres (I) de Silva was married and had a son Olupathage Don Andres (II) de Silva, who had a son Olupathage Don Simon (II) de Silva, married to Doña Adriana de Silva in 1840.

Olupathage Don Andres (I) de Silva also had a son, Olupathage Don Simon (I) de Silva, who married Hami de Jesu do Reis in 1829. The last couple would have a daughter, Django-ham, who married Nadoris Wettimoonige Fernando in 1851.

Nadoris Wettimoonige Fernando was a son of Andres Wettimoonige Fernando. Hami de Jesu do Reis was a daughter of Andres Fernando do Reis, a son of Jacintho Mateus do Reis.

Andres (II) 's son, Simon (II), and Adriana had two known children, Olupathage Don Juan de Silva and Olupathage Doña Malido de Silva. Juan would have a son, Olupathage Don Carolis de Silva, while Malido would marry Alves Arachige Fernando in 1865. Alves' father was Daniel Arachige Fernando, son of Diego Arachige Fernando.

Carolis had a son, Olupathage Don Simon Aires de Silva, born in 1905, who married, in 1927, to Laines Hami de Silva, born in 1901 and from Jalpitiya. This couple had a son, Olupathage Don Perez de Silva, who married Doña Sia Doris Hami. The couple were the parents of Belin de Silva and the father of Shirani de Silva.

Laines Hami de Silva was the daughter of Sadilis de Silva, the son of Juan Enrique de Silva, and the son of Simon Heva de Silva.

Note that in the 19th century, it was customary to form names that included the family name, the father's name, and sometimes even the grandfather's name. The expression '-ge' or '-gey' represents the genitive in such a case.

The wedding certificate, in Figure 54.9, of December 13, 1829 (or 1827), of Uduwara in the district of Kalutara administration, is that of Olupathage Don Simon de Silva ('Oloopatege Siman Silva'), bachelor and son of Olupathage Don Andres (II) de Silva ('Oloopatege Andris Silva'), from the Chalia caste (i.e. the Salagama caste), who married Hami de Jesu do Reis, spinster and daughter of Andres Fernando do Reis and granddaughter of Jacintho Mateus do Reis ('Jasintomatiadurige Jisohami'). The bride was from Uduwara. The groom was from Pategade (neighboring Uduwara).

The marriage certificate, in Figure 54.10 of May 15, 1840, of Uduwara in the district of Kalutara administration, is that of Olupathage Don Simon (II) de Silva, bachelor and son of Olupathage Don Andres (II) de Silva, from the Chalia caste, who married Doña Adriana de Silva, spinster and daughter of Don Mio Siño Andres de Silva ('Miusinghe Andris de Silva'), from the Chalia caste. The groom was from Pategade (neighboring Uduwara), and the bride was from Halgoda (neighboring Uduwara).

The wedding certificate, in Figure 54.11, of Uduwara in the district of Kalutara administration, of January 6, 1851, is that of Wettimoonige Nadoris Fernando, bachelor and son of Wettimoonige Andres Fernando, from the Chalia caste, with Olupathage Doña Django-Hami de Silva ('O. Jangohamy de Silva'), spinster and daughter of Olupathage Don Simon (I) de Silva, from the Chalia caste (Simon (I) was married to Hami de Jesu do Reis in 1829).

The marriage certificate, in Figure 54.12, of December 25, 1865, of Uduwara in the district of Kalutara administration, is that of Alves Arachige Fernando, bachelor and son of Daniel Arachige Fernando and grandson of Diego Arachige Alves Fernando ('Diaguaratchige Awis Fernando'), with Olupathage Doña Malido de Silva, spinster and daughter of Olupathage Don Simon (II) de Silva. The groom was from Weragoda, and the bride was from Halgoda (neighboring Uduwara).

Figure 54.13 is a Kalutara administration certificate from May 2, 1927. It shows the wedding of Olupathage Don Simon Aires de Silva ('Olupathage Samenaris de Silva'), born in 1895, a bachelor from Uduwara and son of farmer Olupathage Don Carolis de Silva, with Laines Hami de Silva from Jalpitiya, born in 1901, daughter and spinster of deceased merchant Sadilis de Silva and granddaughter of Juan Enrique de Silva, son of Simon Heva de Silva ('Yaneninne Simanhewage Sadilis de Silva'). They registered their marriage later than the wedding itself, also reflected by their respective age. This was probably done to buy a property.

It is important to remember that childbirth registration was obligatory shortly after birth, but the marriage was valid without registration.

In the 19th century, there were numerous birth certificates of 'unmarried' parents, although both parents were named on the certificate in most cases. Many birth certificates also mention 'said to be married' or 'married according to their customs.'

We can refer, for instance, to Arnold Wright's book[2], stating,

'The low-country Sinhalese, like the Tamils, the Burghers, and Europeans, are subject to the general law, which is now contained in ordinance N0. 2, 1895 (as amended by Ordinance N0. 19, 1900). Registration is not indispensable to marriage's validity but is usually availed of by well-to-do classes and universally by the Europeans and Burghers.'

Figures 54.14, 54.15, 54.16, 54.17 and 54.18 show the wedding photos of Dom Olupathage Perez de Silva and Doña Sia Doris Hami's children. Pictures were very uncommon before WWII, and the ones that were taken were typically lost in later decades, either by natural disasters, deterioration, or elsewhere. Fungus in a tropical country often damage pictures, even more so for modern photo-paper portraits.

Doña Sia Doris Hami is shown in Figure 54.19, and Siri Sena Olupathage de Silva in 54.20.

Certificates of recent times are shown in Figures 54.21, 54.22, and 54.23 in low resolution to preserve our privacy.

Olupathage Belin de Silva's identity card shows that he was born in Uduwara on November 23, 1941. His death is shown in Figures 54.24, 54.25, 54.26 and 54.27.

For genealogical reference to anyone who would work further on the ancestry of Olupathage Shirani de Silva, we can mention the following found appearances of near or distant blood relatives in the recent Sri Lankan records, even though we don't know exactly how they are related:

Register of Births 14250, Western Province, Kalutara District, Kalutara Town division: On August 11, 1929, was born at Kalutara North Dansi Nona, daughter of trader Olupathage Velis Silva and Vethige Nimel Hamy, married. The informant was the father, Olupathage Velis Silva, from Kalutara North. The child was registered on August 14, 1929.

Register of Births, 7813 or 7814, Western Province, District Kalutara, Division Kalutara Town: born on September 22, 1942, at 259 Main Road Kalutara, Kanalawathie, daughter of Walimmi Indras, a soldier, and Olupathage Raisa de Silva. The informant was Olupathage Carolis de Silva, a family member of the mother of 259 Main Road Kalutara.

For future reference, we would like to notify the reader that Olupathage Somawathi de Silva told, in August 2014, that Olupathage Babo Siño de Silva was the father of Olupathage Belin de Silva. This is not according to the documents and contradicts what all other family members recalled. Hence, we believe that her old age caused her to confuse names. Nevertheless, it is worth mentioning because if she is confused with another person, then Babo Siño may also appear in still-to-be-found administrative documents of the family as a brother or uncle. For instance, around 1930, we found in Kalutara children of an Olupathage Podi Siño de Silva, as shown further below.

Register of Births, 7579, Western Province, District of Kalutara: born on April 4, 1912, at Horana' Gnaup,' was Dona Alice ('Alice Nona')[3], daughter of Babo Siño ('Bampy Sinno')[4], a driver, and of Dona Casa ('Casa Nona'), who were both Sinhalese and married 'according to their rites and laws of their community.' The child was registered on May 13, 1912, by informant His M Haselden Cawley, with birth registration upon the informant's report as the superintendent of Estate under section 16.1.

Register of Births, 8319, Western Province, District of Kalutara: born on January 14, 1913, at Mirishena, William, son of Babu Siño and Podina. The informant was L.P. Gapp, superintendent of Estate under Section 16.1, and the registration was done on February 28, 1913.

Register of Births, 13378, Western Province, District of Kalutara, division of Kalutara Town: born on November 25, 1927, at Kalutara North, was Jhenoris, son of Olupathage Podi Siño Silva and Hekkini Nona Sela, married. The informant was the father, Olupthage Podi Siño Silva, from Kalutara North. The child was registered on November 23, 1927.

Register of Births, nr 14138, Western Province, Kalutara district, Kalutara town division: On May 18, 1929, was born at Kalutara North: Devail Silva, son of Olupathage Pody Siño Silva and Hakkini Dela Nona, married. The informant was Olupathage Podi Siño Silva, from Kalutara North, the father. The child was registered on May 22, 1929.

Register of Births, 4135, Western Province, District Kalutara, Division Kalutara Town: born on September 2, 1938, at Kalutara Hospital, Salson Sirisena Siño, son of motor car driver Olupathage Wilbert Siño and his wife Seeki Arachchige Adin Nona Silva. The registration was on September 5, 1938, upon the informant Antonyge Mary Fernando of Kalutara Hospital's report.

54.2 The Appearance of Lambda and Delta in Tombstones, Buildings and Churches at Goa

Note that Belin de Silva's tombstone, in Figure 54.5 on page 1054, shows a delta sign with quarter-circle ornaments on the corners. Such symbolism is very typical for Goa as can be found in Figures 54.29, 54.30, 54.31, 54.32, 54.33, 54.34 and 54.35. Note that Lambda stands for Lusiadas, which means Portuguese, while Delta stands for Deus, or 'God.' Therefore, Lambda and Delta's appearance in many constructions can be considered a reference to God and Country for the Portuguese.

54.3 Alvaro de Carvalho, the Son of Alvar Garcia Bejarano and Mencia Gonzalez de Carvalho, the Eldest Known Paternal Ancestor of Shirani de Silva

Before we describe Honorato de Carvalho's ancestors, it's interesting to read Chapter 74 where we learn that Shirani de Silva shares autosomal DNA with Goncalves, Salinas, Mendoza, Castile, Vasquez, Bejarano, etc. These are all names that also appear in the

Note the appearance of the Delta symbol and the ornamented and gently squeezed Lambda symbol. (Goa, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

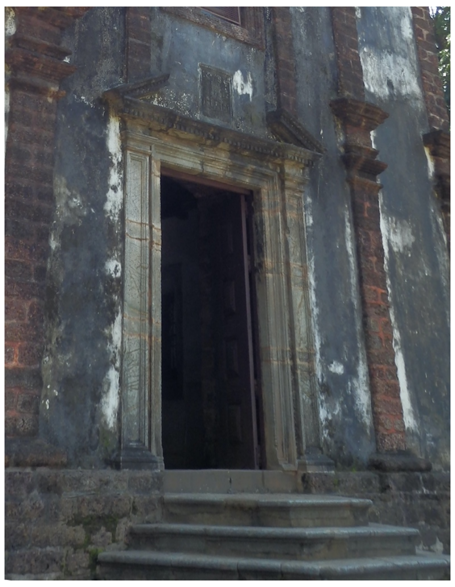

Figure 54.35: *Santa Catarina Chapel at Goa. The Portuguese who constructed the chapel placed a shield above the entrance but did not give up the Delta or Lambda shape. Here, they found a compromise. Afonso de Albuquerque built the chapel to commemorate his entry into the city on Santa Catarina's day and was later further enlarged by Governor George Cabral in 1550. "The lion went up" (Jer. iv. 7)—this is Nebuchadnezzar in the constellation of the lion ("the fifth month," Jer. i. 3)—and destroyed the lion of God ("Jerusalem," Isa. xxix. 1). Accordingly will also come the lion ("God," Amos iii. 8) in the constellation of the lion, in the same month in which Jerusalem was destroyed (compare Jer. xxxi. 12: "I shall change her mourning into joy"), and He will rebuild the lion of God (Ps. cxlvii. 2; Pesiḳ. xiii. 116a). That Israel had found no rest (Lam. i. 3) as he went into exile assured his return home; for Noah's dove returned also because she had found no rest for her feet (Gen. viii. 9); and with the same words is also predicted Israel's restlessness in exile (Deut. xxviii. 65; Lam. R. i. 3). When in consequence of the sins of Israel the enemy had entered Jerusalem, captured his heroes and tied their hands behind them, God said: "With him am I in distress" (Ps. xci. 15); "My children are in distress, shall I be in freedom?" Then He drew His right hand back from before the enemy (Lam. ii. 3). This was revealed to Daniel by the expression לקץ הימין (Dan. xii. 13, the real meaning "at the end of days"), "till the end of the right hand," that right hand which was in subjection. "With the redemption of My sons have I also redeemed My right hand" (Pesiḳ. xvii. 131b).

CARABAJAL (variously spelled Carabal, Caraballo, Caravajal, Carbajal, and Cavajal, the name Carvalho being possibly identical): The name of a family of Maranos in Mexico at the end of the sixteenth century and the beginning of the seventeenth, all connected with Don Luis de Carabajal, governor of New Leon. Several members of the family suffered martyrdom at the stake for Judaizing.

Francisca Nunez de Carabajal: Sister of Don Luis de Carabajal; born in Portugal about 1540; died as a martyr in the city of Mexico Dec. 8, 1596. She was among the members of the family seized in 1590 by the Inquisition. She also was tortured till she implicated her husband and her children, one of whom was named Luis de Carabajal. The whole family were forced to confess and abjure at a public auto da fé, celebrated on Saturday, Feb. 24, 1590. Luis de Carabajal, with his mother and four sisters, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and his brother, Baltasar, who had fled upon the first warning of danger, was, along with his father, Francisco Rodriguez de Matos, deceased, burnt in effigy. In January, 1595, Doña Francisca and her children were accused of a relapse into Judaism, and convicted. During their imprisonment they were tempted to communicate with one another on Spanish pear seeds, on which they wrote touching messages of encouragement to remain true to their faith. At the resulting auto da fé, Doña Francisca and her children, Isabel, Catalina, Leonor, and Luis, died at the stake, together with Manuel Diaz, Beatriz Enriquez, Diego Enriquez, and Manuel de Lucena. Of her other children, Doña Mariana, who lost her reason for a time, was tried and put to death at an auto da fé held in the city of Mexico March 25, 1601; Anica, the youngest child, being "reconciled" at the same time.

Don Luis de Carabajal y Cueva: Born at Magodorio, Portugal, in 1539; appointed governor of a district in Mexico in 1579; said to have died about 1595. In consideration of the appointment of governor, he undertook to colonize a certain territory at his own expense, being allowed the privilege of repaying himself out of the revenues. His original jurisdiction, under the name of "Nuevo Reino de Leon" (New Kingdom of Leon), was to comprise a somewhat ill-defined territory, beginning at the port of Tampico, extending along the River Panuco, and thence turning northward; but it was not to exceed 200 leagues either way. It would seem to have included Tamaulipas, as well as the states of Nuevo Leon and Coahuila, and parts of San Luis Potosi, Zacatecas, Durango, Chihuahua, and Texas. Carabajal received his royal patent as governor of Nuevo Reino de Leon on May 31, 1579. He arrived in Mexico in 1580, and began to prepare for his occupancy of the territory. He planted his colony on a site formerly called "Santa Lucia," and named the place "City of Leon."

To pacify and colonize the new territory, Carabajal was allowed 100 soldiers, and 60 married laborers, accompanied by their wives and children. It is safe to assume that a number of these early colonists were Spanish Jews, who, under the guise of Maranos, had hoped to escape persecution and find prosperity in the New World. In this expectation they were doomed to disappointment, for within a decade after their settlement a score of them were openly denounced and more or less severely punished for Judaizing. In 1590 there seems to have been an extensive colony of them in Mexico.

Don Luis de Carabajal brought with him to Mexico his brother-in-law, Don Francisco Rodriguez de Matos, and his sister, Doña Francisca Nuñez de Carabajal, with their children, Doña Isabel, the oldest, 25 years of age, widow of Gabriel de Herrera; Doña Catalina, Doña Mariana, Doña Leonor, Don Baltasar, Don Luis, Jr., Miguel, and Anica (the last two being very young). Another son, Caspar, a pious young man (monk?) in the convent of Santo Domingo, Mexico, had arrived a short time before. Doña Catalina and Doña Leonor married respectively Antonio Diaz de Caceres (see Caceres) and Jorge de Almeida—two Spanish merchants residing in the city of Mexico and interested in the Tasco mines. The entire family then removed to the capital, where, in the year 1590, while in the midst of prosperity, and seemingly leading Christian lives, they were seized by the Inquisition. Doña Isabel was tortured till she implicated the whole of the Carabajal family, who, with the exception of Don Baltasar, were imprisoned. The latter succeeded in escaping to Tasco, and was condemned to death in his absence.

Luis de Carabajal, Jr.: Son of Doña Francisca Nuñez de Carabajal, the first Jewish author in America, and nephew of Luis de Carabajal, governor of New Leon; was Castilian by birth, and a resident of the city of Mexico; died in the city of Mexico at an auto da fé Sept. 8, 1596. He had been "reconciled" at that city Feb. 24, 1590, being sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the lunatic hospital of San Hipolito. On Feb. 9, 1595, he was again arraigned as a "relapso," subsequently testifying against his mother and sisters (if the records are to be believed). At one of the hearings (Feb. 25) he was shown a manuscript book beginning with the words: "In the name of the Lord of Hosts" (a translation of the Hebrew invocation, "be shem Adonay Zebaot"), which he acknowledged as his own book, and which contained his autobiography. On Feb. 8, 1596, he was put on the rack from 9:30 A.M. till 2 P.M., and then denounced no less than 121 persons, though he afterward repudiated his confession. He threw himself out of a window to escape further torture. He and his brother Baltasar composed hymns and dirges for the Jewish fasts: one of them, a kind of "widdui" (confession of sin) in sonnet form, is given in "El Libro Rojo."

CARACALLA: Roman emperor (211–217); son of Septimius Severus. It is said that as a boy of seven he had a Jewish playfellow, and having heard that the latter had been cruelly whipped on account of his religion, he could not for a long time endure the sight either of his own father or of the boy's father, both of whom were responsible for the punishment (Spartianus, "Antoninus Caracalla," i.). The anecdote may be credited, since his mother, Julia Domna, was a Syrian. While still a prince, though already invested with the title "Augustus," his father permitted him to have a triumphal procession on the occasion when the Senate decreed Septimius Severus a Jewish triumph in honor of his successful wars in Syria (Spartianus, "Severus," xvi.); for the words "Cui senatus Judaicum triumphum decreverat" do not refer to Caracalla, as has been erroneously assumed (Grätz, "Gesch. der Juden," 4th ed., iv. 208), but to Septimius Severus, who as a mere amusement allowed even his youthful son to take part in the triumph.

As Augustus, Caracalla, whose real name was Bassianus, assumed the name Antoninus (beginning 198), an official designation under which he is mentioned several times together with his father. A synagogal inscription found in the otherwise little-known place Ḳaisun contains a prayer of the Jews for the welfare of the whole imperial family, naming Septimius Severus, the empress Julia Domna, and their two sons, Antoninus and Geta ("Journal Asiatique," Dec., 1864; "Monatsschrift," 1865, p. 154). Hence Jerome's words in his commentary on Dan. xi. 34: "Hebræorum quidam hæc de Severo et Antonino principibus intelligunt qui Judæos plurimum dilexerunt" (Many of the Jews take this to refer to the emperors Severus and Antoninus, who greatly loved the Jews), are to be ancestry of Honorato de Carvalho. The bloodline is based on several ancestry trees on Geneanet®.

It is essential to note that an extensive investigation on the available ancestry trees of Geneanet®, has not revealed any still living patrilineal descendants of this particular family. However, other families in Spain and other world areas always carry this family name.

Variants of this family name are Carvajal, Carabajal, Caravajal, Carbajal, Carvalho, Carvalhal, Carvalho, and Curbello. Many families must exist indeed because when we check for this name on FamilyTreeDNA®, we find a large variety of Y-DNA Haplogroups, including the rather typical European R-DF27, R-S933, R-M153, the rather usual for the area of Persia and Andalusia I-M170, the typical Native American Q-M346, Q-M242, the typical North-African E-M2, the Sephardic J-M172, J-M267, T-M70, T-CTS6507 and also E-M35, R-M269, R-M267, Q-M242, etc. Note that the E-M35, A-M242, R-M269, R-M267, J-M267, J-M172, and T-M70 Haplogroups also appear in Pilgrims in the database of the earlier mentioned scientific report of Begoña Martinez-Cruz et al. They originate from tribes of whom some passed their character into Flamenco music, as illustrated in Figure 54.36.

The maternal line originates from a high caste in India. Indeed, a reference marker in the de Silva DNA is that the mtDNA is R31 and is known to stem from the Kshatriya caste in Rajasthan and Gujarat, the Brahmins from Uttar Pradesh, and the Reddy from Andhra Pradesh.

The R31 mtDNA Haplogroup is relatively rare, is more than four thousand years old, and appears mainly in the North-West of India[5]. The Kshatriya caste comprises ancient warriors and is the second-highest caste in India, just below the Brahmin.

The R31 mtDNA is described by Monika Karmin[6] and in The American Journal of Human Genetics. [7]

Thus, the mtDNA may have been in the de Silva ancestors before their departure to the West and must involve marriages with blood relatives or mixed with the bloodline after they arrived from Iberia in Goa. The latter is likely correct because the R31 Haplogroup has yet to be reported among Iberians.

Therefore, the archaeological evidence below confirms that the first paternal ancestor who arrived in Goa married a woman from one of the highest castes in India.

A brief reconstruction of the paternal migration path appears in Chapter 74.2. They arrived in Iberia through the Byzantine migration path between 224 and 1300.

When we check where the samples closest to the Y-DNA Haplogroup H-Z34561 on the Indian continent originate from, we find Gujarat, along the Byzantine migration path out of India.

FamilyTreeDNA® shows the appearance of the branch H-SK1225 with all sub-branches (including H-Z34561) in the following countries today: Spain (1), Finland (2), Scotland (2), Ireland (1), England (1), France (1), Slovakia (1), Bulgaria (1), Moldova (1), Iraq (1), Pakistan (1). Like many tribes that originated in India, the Carvalho ancestors arrived in Iberia as pilgrims or chalanes. The latter referred to their possession and trade of horses.

As detailed in Chapter 74, they left North-West India before 500 and migrated to Afghanistan and Persia, where they resided between approximately 800 and 1000. They migrated further through Armenia into Asia Minor and arrived in the Peloponnese and Byzantium between 1100 and 1300.

There are documents from the 1200s in Byzantium that show that the Indian tribes were taxed there.

Like the Visigoths before them, some tribes migrated fairly quickly to Iberia. They were welcomed as Pilgrims on the Camino de Santiago, probably disguised as Catholic Greeks (Graciano or de Grecia).

When they settled in Trujillo near Cáceres, it was on the Pilgrimage route from Sevilla to Salamanca and Leon along the East-West pilgrimage route from Barcelona to Pamplona and further West to Santiago de Compostela.

During their stay in the Byzantine and the Peloponnese, they got accustomed to pilgrimage because they resided on the route from Western Europe to the Holy Land and appeared in written reports about pilgrimages. In 1499, perhaps too many tribes had arrived in Iberia, and therefore, there was a royal edict in Spain forced those tribes who continued to live as nomads to settle.

By then, the tribes that had arrived in 1200-1400 had long been integrated with the Iberian societies and possibly even did not associate with the new arrivals at the end of the 15th century and later. The massive expansion of Spain during the Reconquista coincided with those early arrivals and encouraged them to settle in the newly conquered territories as Spaniards.

An interesting study appeared in the Jewish encyclopedia on the Sephardic Carabajal family in Mexico[8] which dates from a century later. Catalina de Leon y de la Cueva, daughter of Francisco Rodriguez de Matos and Francisca Nunez de Carvajal, was born in Benavente, Portugal, in late 1565 or early 1566. She married Antonio Diaz de Caceres in Feb 1586 in Panuco, New Spain (Mexico). Her maternal uncle was Luis de Carvajal y de la Cueva, named Nuevo Reino de Leon governor on May 31, 1579. She was burned at the stake in Mexico City in the Auto de Fe of 08 Dec 1596.

Still, it is an interesting case because the branch is associated with Jews. It is consistent with our discovery that the family passed through the Middle East while migrating from North India through Byzantine to Iberia. A mixed marriage and the matrilineal importance of Judaism explain how a branch became Sephardic rather than Catholic. It also explains fractions of DNA common with Jews in Chapter 74.12.2. The Mexican branch, therefore, very distant patrilineal relatives of Shirani de Silva, as described in the literature, is shown in Figure 54.37.

There are family names associated with the descendants of the Carvalho branch in Mexico that also appear with common DNA, such as Nunez, de Leon, Diaz, de Medina, Rodriguez, Salas, de las Duenas, Miranda, Ortiz, Villegas, Romero, de Pimentel, de Silba, de Soto, etc.

54.3.1 Alvaro de Carvalho & Leonor de la Torre

Notably, Alvaro de Carvalho, the son of Alvar Garcia Bejarano (señor de Orellana de la Sierra) and Mencia Gonzalez de Carvalho, adopted the name 'de Carvalho' due to its higher social status compared to his father's name 'Bejarano.' This decision reflects the complex social dynamics of the time, where the choice of a surname could signify one's social standing.

The surnames Carvajal and Carvalho, both derived from the term 'oak' in Spanish and Portuguese respectively, have a strong geographical connection. 'Carvajal' is a topographic name, indicating someone who lived near an oak grove, or a habitational name from places named Carvajal in Spain. Similarly, 'Carvalho' is a topographic name for someone living near an oak tree or oak grove. Some Carvalho lineages in Portugal have origins linked to families with the surname Carvajal in Spain.

Alvar Garcia Bejarano was from Trujillo and was born around 1322. The area had been in the hands of Castile since around 1165. His heraldic shield was a lion similar to de Silva's but not crowned. The literature about older ancestors needs to be clarified and probably embedded in fantasy.

Interestingly, Bejarano is on the list of often-used names by the Pilgrims, as explained in Chapter 74. So we may safely assume that Alvar Garcia Bejarano stems from parents who had migrated over several hundreds of years from India to Spain, through the Byzantine migration route as described in Chapter 74.2 and confirmed by DNA analysis in Chapter 74.

As indicated, the shield of Bejarano was,

'En campo de plata un león rampante al natural y cuatro cabezas de dragones de sinople lampasados de gules, movientes,' and, therefore, resembled the de Silva shield, which may have been an additional reason to assimilate later with the de Silva family through a maternal line.

The name Bejarano or Vejarano may have more than one origin. Some claim that it comes from Bet-Haran, which is Hebrew and is found in the Tora[9]. Bet-Haran is located North-East of the Dead Sea in nowadays Jordan and is called 'Tall el-Hammam.' Alvar Garcia Bejarano may, therefore, have inherited the name from an ancestor along the Byzantine migration path. Settlers of Indian origin often took an existing local name or used the name of a locality to gain better acceptance.

Indeed, the term can also stem from 'Beja' in Portugal or 'Béjar' in Spain. The latter is perhaps the most reasonable as it's near Salamanca, between Trujillo and Leon, and may have been the first settlement place of the family on the Iberian Peninsula, along the Camino. Béjar has been Morish from 713 until the 11th century.

Scholars have yet to agree on where the name comes from, although they tend to assume it's of pre-Roman origin.

54.3.2 Diego de Carvalho & Elvira de Toledo

Diego de Carvalho was born in 1502 in Trujillo in the Extremadura province of Salamanca in Leon, as the son of Alvaro de Carvalho and Leonor de la Torre. He was married to Elvira de Toledo (who died in 1532). Diego de Carvalho had been married before to Beatriz de Vargas from Salamanca in 1522, who was the daughter of Juan de Vargas Carvalho and Maria de Sotomayor. Interesting is the fact that Diego de Carvalho was Correo Mayor de las Indias y Tierra Firme (2ndo, 1527); he was also the Lord of the cities of Puerto and Valhonda, he was the 'regidor' of Trujillo, alcaide of Fortaleza (1527), Knight in the order of Santiago. Diego de Carvalho died in Lima, Peru, around 1567. One of his sons was Diego de Vargas Carvalho, who had high positions in Lima and

54.3.3 Antonio de Carvalho & Teresa de Mendoza

Antonio de Carvalho is the son of Diego de Carvalho and Elvira de Toledo (who died in 1532). He was married to Teresa de Mendoza, the daughter of Honorato de Mendoza and Francisca de Silva (who died in 1534). Honorato de Mendoza was a son of Juan Hurtado de Mendoza and Ines Manrique. Francisca de Silva was the daughter of Juan de Silva (the count of Cifuentes, who died in 1464) and Inés de Ribeira.

54.3.4 Honorato de Carvalho & Maria de Silva

Honorato de Carvalho is the son of Antonio de Carvalho and Teresa de Mendoza. He became the Lord of Salinas in 1552. He married Maria de Silva. The couple had the following children: Fernando (Lord of Salinas in 1583 and married Germana de Luna y Loaysia), Honorato Carvalho de Silva, and Juan Carvalho de Silva. Honorato Carvalho de Silva died in Namen, Belgium 1613 in the Army of Flanders. Juan de Silva, as described further in the book, would be the progenitor of the de Silva branch of Uduwara through his son Antonio. The latter, known as Antonio Carvalho de Silva or Antoni de Silva, died in Sri Lanka in 1617 and had constructed the fortress of Uduwara the decade before. He was an army captain and Shirani de Silva's earliest Sri Lankan paternal ancestor. His wife was either Luso-Indian, Luso-Sri Lankan, or Sri Lankan. His descendants, of course, intermarried with other Sri Lankans, which is evident from DNA analysis.

54.4 Concerning the Carvalho family in the Extremadura and Goa

Geneanet's® investigation revealed essential links between the Carvalho family through marriages and several family names associated with Pilgrim families. One such connection is, as shown above, the patrilineal link to a Bejarano, who must have been a child of immigrants in Spain in the early 14th century of so-called Pilgrim clans who migrated to Spain over several hundreds of years from Byzantine. Also, in later times, the Carvalho clan related to families who were likely of Pilgrim descent and Iberians of other origins. Their most ancient roots, before their Byzantine period, can be found in India, just like that of Flamenco dancers, illustrated in Figure 54.38.

We may mention Diego de Carvalho y Vargas, born around 1480, 4th Lord of Valero, who was married to Elvira Contreras y Carillo de Mendoza and who was the son of Sancho de Carvalho and Ines Calderon. This Sancho de Carvalho was a son of Diego Gonzales de Carvalho and of Juana Garcia de Ulloa. The latter, Diego Gonzales, was the son of Alonso Garcia de Vargas and Sevilla Lopez. We also find links between the Carvalho family and Guzmán, Silva (as described in this book), Suarez, Meneses, Loyola, and de la Cueva.

The surname Carvajal, with its origins in the scenic Portuguese town of Penacova, nestled at the foot of the Carvalho Mountains, and its notable presence in the Spanish enclave of Carballo, near the Portuguese border in the province of Galicia, carries a rich geographical significance that adds depth to its historical context.

The Carvajals represent a fusion of Spanish and Portuguese heritage.[10][11][12] While branches residing in Portugal or its overseas territories typically adopted the spelling 'Carvalho,' counterparts in Spain or Spanish overseas territories favored the "Carvajal" variant.

Historically, the early Carvalhos were a diverse group, hailing from various backgrounds, such as converted Jews, Moors, Gypsies, and other migrants who journeyed from Eastern regions to the Iberian Peninsula. Recent DNA investigations have confirmed this lineage diversity, revealing that variations like Carabal, Caraballo, Caravajal, Carbajal, Cavajal, Caravalho, and Carvalho all trace their roots back to the expansive Carvajal clan. Patrilineal DNA analysis, covering Haplogroups E, G, I, J, Q, R, T, and H, further underscores this genetic amalgamation, highlighting matrilineal influences on family nomenclature.

Delving deeper into Carvalho's genealogy, connections with the de Silva lineage emerge, tracing back to Leon, specifically in Carbajal de Fuentes and Carbajal de Rueda. Noteworthy alliances with the House of Leon include the marriage of Don Pelayo Fruela de Carvalho, nephew of King Fruela II, to Aldonza Ordonez and the union of King Fruela II with Acenera de Carvalho. Signifying their Leonese affiliations, family members such as Don Antonio de Carvalho, stationed in Tenochtitlan, Mexico, displayed coats of arms featuring rampant lions clasping a golden crown. Commonly, the Carvalho emblem features a sabre-adorned golden field, symbolizing the etymological association with 'Carvajo,' meaning 'oak.'

Further afield, Carvalho kin ventured to Goa and Sri Lanka, adopting a distinct emblem featuring a star encircled by four crescent moons—a motif typically associated with Carvajal lineages. The utilization of this emblem by Carvalhos in Goa underscores the interchangeable nature of the Carvajal and Carvalho designations, emblematic of Spanish and Portuguese variants of the same ancestral lineage. An impression of a mixed couple in Goa is shown in Figure 54.39.

The Carvajal legacy extends to New Spain, particularly in Nueva Leon, where figures like Luis Carvajal played pivotal roles in shaping colonial history. Luis Carvajal's pivotal role in establishing the Kingdom of Nuevo Leon and facilitating the migration of numerous Spanish families, many of whom were converted Jews, underscores the enduring influence of the Carvajal lineage in shaping global history.[13][14][15][16].

In exploring the intricate historical entanglements between the Goan populace and the Iberian cultural influences, particularly manifested through surnames, a nuanced understanding emerges. Despite the apparent semblance in name origin between 'Carvajal' or 'Carbajal' and 'Carvalho,' the Goans exhibited a pronounced identification with the latter. This assertion finds substantiation in the meticulous examination of their heraldic shields adorning their final resting places. These visual emblems serve as markers of familial lineage and poignant reflections of cultural allegiance.

The distinct preference for 'Carvalho' among the Goans diverges notably from the conventions observed by Spanish chroniclers of the era. A recurrent practice among these chroniclers was the deliberate Castilization, or Spanification, of Portuguese names within their literary works. This inclination toward linguistic assimilation often led to the transformation of Portuguese surnames, such as 'Da Silva,' into the Castilian variant, 'De Silva.' Similarly, the appellation 'Carvalho' assumed a modified guise as 'Carvajal' in the annals of Spanish chroniclers. Alvaro de Carvalho, described in Chapter 54.3, the son of Alvar Garcia Bejarano and Mencia Gonzalez de Carvalho, the eldest known paternal ancestor of Shirani de Silva, therefore, also appears in the literature as Alvaro de Carvajal.

54.5 The Ancestors of Maria de Silva and her Family Connection in Portuguese India

54.5.1 Maria de Silva & Honorato de Carvalho

As described above, Shirani de Silva descends from Maria de Silva, and it is due to her that the family has this name. Maria de Silva was a paternal descendant of Pere de Cantabria, who died in 730 and was the Duque of Cantabria. His son was Fruela Pérez de Cantabria. The reader can find the entire genealogy leading to Maria de Silva in Don Luis de Salazar y Castro's book[17]. Most referred persons also appear in other contemporary books and emerge as the spouses of persons of different noble families.

Our records indicate that Maria de Silva, born between 1470 and 1480, was the daughter of Fernando de Silva y Rivera and Maria de Zuñiga. She was married to Honorato de Carvalho, and she married Honorato de Carvalho. The couple had three children: Fernando Carvalho de Silva (Signore di Salinas 1583, married to Germana de Luna y Loaysia), Honorato Carvalho de Silva, and Juan Carvalho de Silva.

It is through Juan Carvalho de Silva that Shirani de Silva's lineage is traced, as previously mentioned. Notably, Juan Carvalho de Silva embarked on a journey to Goa between 1510 and 1520, a significant period during the reign of Afonso de Albuquerque.

To return to Maria de Silva's eldest ancestor and the linkage between the two, we refer primarily to the famous and pervasive work mentioned above by Don Luis de Salazar y Castro of 1685 and to other works we consulted for confirmation. The family line was thus reconstructed until 750 and is described in the following sections.

54.5.2 Pere de Cantabria

According to the literature, the oldest known ancestor of Shirani O. de Silva, along the de Silva bloodline, must have been Duque Pere de Cantabria. He is the oldest known paternal ancestor of Maria de Silva, who married Honorato de Carvalho. So we will start with him and descend to Portugal's ancestors, particularly the mentioned Maria de Silva. Duque Pere de Cantabria died in 730 and was Duque (Dux) of Cantabria. His son was Fruela Pérez de Cantabria.

54.5.3 Fruela Pérez de Cantabria & Ozenda

Fruela de Cantabria (Fruela Pérez) was born around 758. He was the brother of King Alfonso I de Asturias, the son of Duque Pere de Cantabria, and the father of King Aurelio and King Bermudo I.

54.5.4 Bermudo I de Asturias & Uzenda Nunilona

Bermudo I de Asturias was King of Asturias from 789 until 791, as shown in Figure 54.40. He was born in 750 at Oviedo and died in 797. He was the son of Fruela de Cantabria and Ozenda. His son was Ramiro I of Asturias.

54.5.5 Ramiro I of Asturias & Urraca

Ramiro I of Asturias, shown in Figure 54.40, was King of Asturias from 842 until 850. He was born in 790 and died in 850. He was married to Urraca and is the son of Bermudo I el Diácono and Uzenda Nunilona. His son was Ordoño I de Asturias. Genealogists dispute Urraca; therefore, it is not conclusive that this was her name.

54.5.6 Ordoño I de Asturias & Nuña

Ordoño I de Asturias, shown in Figure 54.40, was born in 821 at Oviedo as the son of Ramiro I and Urraca. He was married to Nuña. He was King of Asturias from 850 until 866 and was buried in the Pantheon of Kings of the Cathedral of Oviedo. His son was Alfonso III de Asturias.

54.5.7 Alfonso III de Asturias & Jimena de Asturias

Alfonso III de Asturias, exposed in Figure 54.40, was born around 852 as the son of Ordoño I de Asturias and was King of Asturias from 866 until he died. He was married to Jimena de Asturias. His son was Fruela II de Leon, described in Chapter 54.5.8.

Another son was Ordoño II, King of Leon from 914 until 924 and King of Galicia from 910 until 914. The latter was married to Elvira Menéndez, and the couple had a son, Ramiro II of Leon, King of Leon from 931 until 951 and husband of Urraca Sánchez.

[17] Don Luis de Salazar y Castro, 'Historia Genealogica de la casa de Silva,' in 12 volumes, 1685.

Ramiro II and Urraca Sánchez had a son, Ordoño III of Leon, married to Urraca Fernández. Ordoño III was King of Leon from 951 until 956.
Ordoño III and Urraca Fernández had a son, Bermudo II of Leon, King of Leon from 985 until 999. Bermudo II married Elvira Garcia, and the couple had a son, Alfonso V of Leon, King of Leon from 999 until 1028.
Alfonso V was married to Elvira Menéndez, and the couple had a daughter, Sancha Afonsez of Leon, born around 1018 and died in 1067. Sancha Afonsez of Leon married Fernando I of Leon, King of Leon, from 1037 until 1065.
Fernando I and Sancha Afonsez had a son, Alfonso VI of Leon, King of Leon from 1065 until 1072, and married Constanza de Borgoña.
Alfonso VI and Constanza de Borgoña had a daughter, Urraca I of Leon, Queen of Leon from 1109 until 1126. Urraca I of Leon married Raymond of Bourgogne, and their son was Alfonso VII of León, who married Richezza de Pologne.
Alfonso VII and Richezza de Pologne had a daughter, Sancha of Castilla, who married Alfonso II of Aragon.
Sancha of Castilla and Alfonso II of Aragon had a daughter, María Sánchez of Navarra, who married Gil Podavila. Doña María Sánchez de Navarra and Don Gil Podavila were the parents of Doña Urraca Gil, named in honor of her famous great-grandmother, the Queen, heir to the Crown of León, Doña Urraca de León. Doña Urraca Gil married her cousin Don Pedro Sánchez, lord of Barillas (as a holder), and they were parents of Don Sancho Pérez de Barillas (Varillas Castilianized), who married Doña Estefanía Ruiz de Azagra. The latter couple are ancestors of the author, as described in Chapter 27.2 on page 301. Evidence is shown through DNA in Chapter 74.12.3 on page 1618.

54.5.8 Fruela II de Leon

Fruela II de Leon, seen in Figure 54.40, born around 874 as the son of Alfonso III de Asturias, King of Leon (924-925) and Asturias (910 - 924) and also Galicia, has been buried in the Cathedral of Leon (925-986) and was re-buried in the Pantheon of the Kings of the Cathedral of Oviedo in 986. Don Fruela II had five children: Alonso, King of Leon; Ordoño; Anznar Fruela; Ramiro. His Queen was Acenera de Carvalho, from the Carvalho family that would later marry a Pilgrim and transmit its name, described in Chapter 54.5.23. Later, he would marry into the de Silva family and form the ancestors of Shirani de Silva.

54.5.9 Anznar Fruela

El Infante Don Anznar Fruela had 2 children: El Infante Don Pelayo Fruela and Don Ximeno Fruela.

54.5.10 Ximeno Fruela

Don Ximeno Fruela had six children: Count Don Pere Pelaez, Don Ordoño Pelaez, Count Munio Pelaez, Don Pelayo Pelaez, La Infante Doña Christina, and La Infanta Dona Teresa, countess of Carrion.

54.5.11 Pelayo Pelaez

Don Pelayo Pelaez had two children: Count Don Congzalo Pelaez, Lord of Cisneros, and Don Gutierre Pelaez, Lord of Alderete y de Silva.

54.5.12 Gutierre Pelaez, the Lord of Alderete y de Silva

Don Gutierre Pelaez had one child: Don Pelayo Gutierrez de Silva, Lord of the House of de Silva, a rich man and Adelantado mayor of Portugal.

54.5.13 Pelayo Gutierrez de Silva

Don Pelayo Gutierrez de Silva had seven children: Don Pere Paez de Silva, a wealthy man in Portugal; Count Don Gomez Paez de Silva; Don Mendo Paez; Don Payo Paez; Doña Mayor Paez de Silva, Dame of Butriande; Don Pere of Porto; Doña Gontiña Paez de Silva, Countess of Refoyos.

54.5.14 Gomez Paez de Silva

Count Don Gomez Paez de Silva had four children: Martin Gomez de Silva (who had two daughters: Doña Aldonza Martinez de Silva, Dame of Honour de Mancilla, and Doña Estefania), Pelayo Gomez de Silva (IV), Dońa Maria (Dame of the house of Correa), and Doña Veraca (married to Don Gomez Mendez de Briteros, a wealthy man).

54.5.15 Pelayo Gomez de Silva & Maria Fernandes de Novoa

Pelayo Gomez de Silva (IV) (1170 - 1258) was married to Maria Fernandes de Novoa. She had three children: Gomez Paez de Silva (II) (Alcayde Mayor de Guimaraes, Signore di Torre de Silva, Alerte, and Porto da Figueira, Alcalde di Castelo de Santa Eulalia), Gonzalo Paez de Silva and Estevan Paez de Silva.

54.5.16 Gomez Paez de Silva (II) & Maria Ruiz de Caldelas

Gomez Paez de Silva (II) was married to Maria Ruiz de Caldelas. She had six children: Martin Gomez de Silva (Lord of the House of de Silva), Gonzalo Paez de Silva, Doña Sancha Gomez de Silva, Juan Gomez de Silva, Doña Maria, and Doña Aldonza.

54.5.17 Martin Gomez de Silva & Teresa Garcia de Seabra

Martin Gomez de Silva was born around 1300, was married to Teresa Garcia de Seabra and had six children: Aires Gomez de Silva the older (Lord of the house of de Silva, Alferez Mayor of Portugal), Alfonso Gomez de Silva (a wealthy man and Alcayde Mayor of Coimbra), Fernan Gomez de Silva (Lord of Oboa), Doña Juana, Doña Aldonza, Doña Mencia de Silva (Dame of Abreu).

54.5.18 Aires Gomez de Silva & Urraca Tenorio

Aires Gomez de Silva (1320 -1365) was married to Urraca Tenorio and had two children: Alfonso Tenoria de Silva (Lord of Barcience and Adelantado of Cazoria), and Doña Beatriz (Dame of Orgàz).

54.5.19 Alfonso Tenoria de Silva & Guiomar de Meneses

Alfonso Tenoria de Silva (1365 - 1430) was married to Guiomar de Meneses and had three children: Don Pere (Obispo of Orence and Badajòz, who died in 1479), Don Juan (I) (Lord of Cifuentes), Doña Maria (Dame of Puensalida) (1410 - 1470).

54.5.20 Don Juan (I) de Silva & Leonor de Acuña

Don Juan (I) (1399 - 1464) had five children: Don Alonso (II) (Lord of Cifuentes), Don Leonor de Silva, Don Juan de Rivera (Lord of Montemayor), Don Pere (Lord of Villa Luenga), Doña Francisca de Silva.

The known descendants up to two generations of Don Juan (I) de Silva have been meticulously traced and added below. This information has been extracted from reliable sources such as Geneanet registered, the book mentioned above, and other credible sources. This comprehensive research will enable future genealogists to confidently link Portuguese records, files dating from the VOC, and documents dating from the British period to the historical ancestry tree.

Juan de Silva was Count of Cifuentes from 1456 until 1464 and Lord of Montemayor, Villaluenga Barcience, Cuetos, Reguilla, Vilila, and Torreccilla. He was born in 1399 in Toledo, Castile La Mancha, and died in 1464. Don Juan was married twice: first in 1428 to Leonor de Acuña and second to Ines de Rivera after Leonor's death in 1436.

With Leonor de Acuña, he had two children: Alonso de Silva and Leonor de Silva. With Ines de Rivera, he had three children: Juan de Rivera y Silva, Pere de Silva, and Francisca de Silva y Rivera.

54.5.20.1 Alonso de Silva (Conde de Cifuentes 1429-1469)

He married twice. With Isabel de Castañeda (Signora di Palos, who died in 1463), he had the following descendants: Juan de Rivera y Silva, described in Chapter 54.5.21.

54.5.20.1.1 Juan de Silva & Catalina Alvarez de Toledo Juan de Silva (Conde de Cifuentes 1452 - 1512 married in 1473 to Catalina Alvarez de Toledo) who had the following children: Alonso de Silva (died in 1512), Fernando I de Silva (Conte di Cifuentes 1480 - 1546), Juan de Silva (Lord of Torrequadrada, who died in 1521), Isabel de Silva (died in 1556), Catalina de Silva (born in 1475), Maria de Silva (1494-1544).

54.5.20.1.2 Rodrigo de Silva y Castañeda He was the Lord of Las Hormazas, married to Maria de Contreras y Portugal, and had the following daughter: Juana de Silva y Castañeda.

54.5.20.1.3 Alonso de Silva He died in 1512.

54.5.20.1.4 Pere de Silva He died in 1506.

54.5.20.1.5 Lope de Silva He was Signore di Honor de Sedano.

54.5.20.1.6 Leonor de Silva She was a nun.

54.5.20.1.7 Maria Gomez de Silva She was married to Luis de la Cerda, the Lord of Villoria, who died in 1469. They had the following daughter: Juana de la Cerda y Castañeda. Consequently, Alonso de Silva married in 1465 to Beatriz Pacheco (Signora di Villarejo de Fuentes 1440 - 1490) and had the following children: Luis Pacheco de Silva, Juan Pacheco, and Ana de Silva.

54.5.20.1.8 Luis Pacheco de Silva He was the Lord of Villarejo de Fuentes, who died in 1530 and married in 1496 to Anna Condulmer. They had the following children: Diego Lopez Pacheco de Silva (who died in 1538), Juana Pacheco de Silva (Signora di Alvaladejo, who died in 1571), Beatriz Pacheco, Maria de Silva (Priora di Monastero della Madre de Dios a Toledo), Ana Condelmario, Juan Pacheco de Silva (the Lord of Villarejo de Fuentes, who died in 1585), Luis Pacheco de Silva (Lord of Villarejo de Fuentes, who died in 1530), and Alonso Pacheco de Silva.

54.5.20.1.9 Juan Pacheco He lived from 1468 until 1469.

54.5.20.1.10 Ana de Silva She lived from 1469 until 1479.

54.5.20.2 Leonor de Silva

She remained childless.

54.5.20.3 Pere de Silva

He had no known children.

54.5.20.4 Francisca de Silva y Rivera

54.5.20.4.1 Juan Hurtado de Mendoza

54.5.20.4.2 Diego Hurtado de Mendoza He was the Marquis of Cañete and lived from 1490 until 1542.

54.5.20.4.3 Rodrigo de Mendoza

54.5.20.4.6 Francisco de Mendoza He was the Prior of Aroche.

54.5.20.4.7 Maria de Mendoza She married Sancho de Cordoba, the Lord of the House of Palma.

54.5.20.4.8 Ines Manrique de Mendoza She was married to Pere Ladron de Vilanova y Pallars, the Viscount of Chelva, who died in 1522.

54.5.20.4.9 Juana de Mendoza She was a nun at the Monastery of Madre de Dios a Toledo.

54.5.20.4.10 Teresa de Mendoza She married Antonio de Carvalho y Toledo, the Lord of Sobrinos.

54.5.21 Juan de Rivera y Silva

He was the Lord of Montemayor (1450-1515) and was married to Juana de Herrera y Toledo (Signora di Galves). They had ten children: Juan de Silva y Rivera, Garcia de Toledo, Alonso Suarez de Toledo, Alonso Suarez de Toledo, Pere de Silva, Diego de Rivera de Toledo, Fernando de Silva, Francesc Suarez de Toledo y Silva, Ines de Rivera y Silva, Francisca de Silva, Guiomar de Silva. Juan de Silva y Rivera was a son of Juan de Rivera y Sylva (Marchese of Montemayor, 1471 -1538) and married in 1491 to Maria Manrique de Toledo, Signora di Mejorada; they had the following children: Juan de Silva y Rivera (Count of Montemayor 1492 - 1566), Diego de Silva, Pere de Silva (Archdeacon of Carvalleda), Francesc de Silva, Alfonso de Silva, Fernando de Silva y Rivera (Lord of Corral, he died in 1571, and is referred to further below), Manrique de Silva (born in 1500); Juan de Silva y Rivera later married to Beatriz de Mendoza and had no children with her. He also married Maria Florin, and their daughter was Juana de Silva. Juan de Silva also married another partner and had a son, Guiomar de Silva, a priest at el Monastero della Madre de Dios in Toledo.

54.5.21.1 Garcia de Toledo

He married in 1483 to Maria Manrique de Toledo, Signora di Mejorada. His children are listed below, and his son Fernando de Silva y Rebera is described in Chapter 54.5.22.

54.5.21.2 Alonso Suarez de Toledo

He was the Lord of Galves.

54.5.21.3 Pere de Silva

54.5.21.4 Diego de Rivera de Toledo

He was the bishop of Mallorca and died in 1543.

54.5.21.5 Francesc Suarez de Toledo y Silva

He was the Lord of Galves.

54.5.21.6 Ines de Rivera y Silva

She married Pere Lopez de Ayala, the Count of Fuensalida, who died in 1537.

54.5.21.7 Francisca de Silva

She was married to Mateo Ribadeneyra, Signore di Caudilla.

54.5.21.8 Guiomar de Silva

54.5.22 Fernando de Silva y Rivera & Maria de Zuñiga

Fernando de Silva y Rivera was the Lord of Corral. He died on June 17, 1571. He was the son of Juan de Silva y Rivera (Marquis of Montemayor (1st), Lord of Lagunilla and Villaseca, born on November 11, 1471, and deceased on August 5, 1538) and Maria Manrique de Toledo (Dame of Mejorada).

Fernando de Silva y Rivera's personal life was marked by his marriage to Maria de Zuñiga, born on February 26, 1547. Together, they had the following children : Pere de Silva y Rivera, Maria de Silva, Isabel de Silva, and Francisca de Silva. His legacy, a testament to his life and family, can also be found in Historia de la Muy Ilustre Casa de Sousa [18].

She had the following children: Pere Gomez de Porrez y Valmediano (Lord of Tremeroso), Maria de Porres Silva y Valmediano (married to Juan Hurtado de Mendoza and had one daughter, Isabel de Mendoza y Porres, Dame of Fresno).

54.5.22.0.3 Francisca de Silva & Juan de Ribadeneyra y Mendoza Francisca de Silva married in 1561 to Juan de Ribadeneyra y Mendoza.

54.5.22.0.4 Maria de Silva, who is described below

54.5.23 Maria de Silva & Honorato de Carvalho

Maria de Silva was the daughter of Fernando de Silva y Rivera and Maria de Zuñiga. She entered into matrimony with Honorato de Carvalho, Lord of Salinas, and bore several children: Fernando Carvalho de Silva, who succeeded as Lord of Salinas in 1583 and was married to Germana de Luna y Loaysia; Honorato Carvalho de Silva; and Juan Carvalho de Silva. It is noteworthy that Honorato de Carvalho hailed from a lineage that had previously intersected with the de Silva line, a detail elaborated in Chapter 54.5.8. Specifically, Chapter 54.3 outlines the ancestry of Honorato de Carvalho, revealing that the eldest paternal ancestor bore the name Bejarano. The historical context of the Iberian Union (1580-1640), a period of significant political and cultural change, is crucial in understanding the migratory patterns and nomenclature preferences of the de Silva family. This was a time when the crowns of Portugal and Spain were unified, and it greatly influenced the de Silva ancestors' decision to migrate to Goa and subsequently to Sri Lanka. This historical backdrop also sheds light on their preference for the Spanish 'de Silva' over the Portuguese 'da Silva,' a preference that was in contrast to earlier arrivals who favored 'da Silva.' In Brazil, both 'Silva' and 'da Silva' are more prevalent, while families bearing the name in Belgium, who arrived with the Spanish, typically used 'de Silva.' The surname Carvalho, a name with a rich and complex history, is a variant of Carballo, with numerous spellings and forms, including Carvallo, Carbello, Carbalho, Caraballo, Carbajo, Carvajal, Caballo, and Carbralo. The way the name was written varied depending on the country: in Spain, it was commonly written as Carvajal, whereas in Portugal, even for the same individuals, it was systematically recorded as Carvalho. This linguistic diversity is a testament to the family's diverse origins and travels. Upon the family's arrival in Goa, the name was likely recorded as Carvalho da Silva, although subsequent generations retained only the 'da Silva' part, adapting the spelling to 'de Silva' in accordance with their original nomenclature preferences.

Further details regarding the ancestors of Carvalho can be found in Chapter 54.3.

54.5.24 Juan Carvalho de Silva

As described above, Juan Carvalho de Silva, depicted in Figure 54.41, was one of Maria de Silva and Honorato de Carvalho's sons. Here, we focus on his link to Goa and, later, Sri Lanka. He left for Goa in India with his uncle Pere de Silva y Rivera (around 1570). Such journeys were immense challenges, very different from modern-day travel, as in Figure 54.42. We can imagine the arrival in Goa or Sri Lanka as in Figure 54.43.

The branch established in Uduwara was Juan Carvalho de Silva, the son of Maria de Silva and nephew of Pere de Silva y Rivera. The latter served as viceroy at Goa. He was the viceroy of India at an old age, from 1635 to 1639. Pere de Silva y Rivera was born around 1570 and died in Goa on June 24, 1639.

He also served as the 2nd Lord of Corral[19]. It was Juan Carvalho de Silva's son, Antonio, in Figure 54.47 on page 1068, who established the stone fortress of Uduwara and is the ancestor of Shirani de Silva.

From the genealogical records summarised above, we know that Pere de Silva y Rivera was married to Elvira Portocarrero y Guzmán. They had two sons, Fernando and Luis Fernando, and one daughter, Sancha. Of their sons, Luis Fernando de Silva y Rivera became the 3rd Lord of Corral and married Antonia Niño de Villena, while Pedro de Silva would become the 5th Lord of Corral. They had several children, including Pere de Silva, who died in 1635, Alonso de Silva, Juan de Silva, and another Pere de Silva, Diego de Silva.

In Figure 54.41, we see that children-like heads are also sculptured (in the form of angels), while Juan Carvalho de Silva is depicted with a dress that reminds the reader of Roman emperors. Below the sculpture, mostly hidden behind a temporary exhibition panel, are two children supporting the sculpture with in-between (likely) a Lion, symbolizing de Silva. On the horizontal banner just below the statue, the naked eye, on-site, can still identify the last part of the engraving 'DOMJUAN CARVALHODESILVA'[20]. The Carvalho de Silva shield remains are also found on the right of this image, shown in Figure 54.44.

It's not clear if Juan Carvalho de Silva died in Goa or returned to Iberia, where the ancestral family lived at that time in Toledo (Talavera de la Reina). Spanish records typically refer to him as Juan Carvajal y de Silva.

54.5.25 The two sons of Juan Carvalho de Silva

The establishment of the Uduwara branch by Antonio Carvalho de Silva, one of the sons, holds significant importance in our historical research. Juan Carvalho de Silva had two sons, depicted in Figure 54.46 as a built-in sculpture with their father at the convent next to the Cathedral de Se at old Goa, where the Archeological Museum is currently housed.

One of them is consequently also depicted on the Olupathage House in the fortress of Uduwara, shown in Figure 61.2 on page 1160. The gender may not be immediately apparent through Western eyes, so the author consulted several well-educated Indians, who all confirmed that the two persons are indeed males, of around 20 years old.

Apart from the experienced Indian eye immediately identifying the figures as males, we can mention, for instance, that, in general, females would not show their naked legs. They would also wear more jewels and explicitly expose visible female features. The hairstyle is that of princes, similar to that of the Lord Buddha. The two sons wear a cape attached to the breast with a probably metal cross.

A facial comparison with Shirani de Silva's father, O. Belin de Silva, is given in Figure 54.48.

54.6 Further evidence of the Carvalho family at Goa

The shield of Carvalho consists of an 8-pointed star with four crescent moons:

'De azul, com uma estrela de ouro de oito raios, encerrada numa caderna de crescentes de prata.'

Together, they form a rose, which is also a symbol of Carvalho. Relics in Goa are shared in Figures 54.49 and 54.50.

54.7 Zameer Khan's Insights on Portuguese Burghers

Before we continue, as introductory knowledge, it's interesting to mention Zameer Khan's insights on the formation of the Portuguese Burgher community in Sri Lanka. His description is congruent with our discoveries and with our DNA analysis. We may quote Zameer Khan's interview on Sri Lankan television in 2021 when our book was almost ready[21].

'The 'burghers' were formed during the settlement of the Portuguese in Sri Lanka as a result of consensual and non-consensual relationships with the natives of our island. There was a community formed during the Portuguese period on our island, which was of mixed Ceylonese and Portuguese descent. Those people were (then) referred to as mestizos and various other terms. The Casados were the soldiers who married the Sri Lankans, and their descendants were also referred to as the mestizos. They were all part of the Portuguese Burgher community, as we call it today. But back then, they were known under various terms. They were the Luso-Asians or those of Portuguese and Ceylonese descent. Likewise, many came from Goa, which was the ecclesiastical capital of Portuguese India. So, many people from Goa came and settled in our country.

During the Dutch colonial period, the Dutch Burgher community was formed. The Dutch used the term 'Burgher' to refer to the town dwellers or the free settlers. Because the Portuguese were involved in all kinds of jobs in the military and the government, craftsmanship, etc., the Dutch started to call those Portuguese Burghers the ambachtslieden. Those Portuguese were a reserve militia for the Dutch and involved in carpeting, smithing, leader-making, shoemaking, etc.

During the Dutch period, there was a policy that if the Portuguese wanted to leave the country, they had to leave behind their widows and unmarried women so the Dutch could marry them. The Dutch freemen or Burghers, who came from various European countries, not only the Netherlands, married those women in our country. Even the Dutch Burgher community has Portuguese roots. Likewise, the Portuguese Burgher community does have Dutch ancestry.'

For the Goa connection, we can redirect the reader, for instance, to Chapter 54.9. At the same time, for DNA analysis showing Iberian as well as VOC links, we can, for example, refer to Chapter 74.6 and Chapter 74.16.

54.8 Luso Indians and Evidence in Uduwara, Sri Lanka

Politicos dos casamentos was the policy imposed by Afonso de Albuquerque, shown in Figure 54.52, to encourage Portuguese soldiers in India to marry local women. Later, to help populate the new Portuguese areas in India, the Portuguese sent many female orphans, called 'Orphans of the King.' They were sent to marry Portuguese soldiers or local men of high status.

Statues and paintings show how early settlers and the first mestizos dressed on official occasions, but little is known about their daily outfits. Figure 54.51 may offer an impression.

Goa was the Portuguese capital of the East and had the nickname 'Rome of the East.' To the Portuguese, it was what Malacca used to be for the Muslims and what Batavia would be for the VOC.

Because of Goa's rich cultural history, including the long Portuguese period, there is a population called 'Luso Indians.' They have Portuguese ancestors primarily mixed with Gaud Saraswat Brahmin origin families.

Shirani de Silva's DNA is a blend of the Gaud Saraswat Brahmins and the Kshatriya caste. Indeed, in Chapter 54.3, it is described that Shirani de Silva's mitochondrial DNA stems from the Kshatriya caste, while autosomal links have been found with the Gaud Saraswat Brahmins. These are, traditionally, the two highest classes of India. Geographically, the Gaud Saraswat Brahmin origins also match the Kuru Kingdom, which is believed to be the origin of the Karava caste of Sri Lanka. Therefore, the first generations of the de Silvas in Uduwara in Sri Lanka must have easily been associated with the Karava.

Today, more than 50000 people are believed to speak Portuguese in Goa. There are no longer Portuguese newspapers in Goa, but associations encourage cultural exchange with Portugal.

In the context of the early mix of the Portuguese ancestors with Brahmins, it is of fundamental importance to mention that the ancestral home of Shirani de Silva (probably not dating back to Portuguese times, but constructed in Portuguese style) had a cemented swastika, high on the outer wall. The swastika symbol is found in India, such as the Brahmins, and in Europe during Roman times. It may be that this tradition dates back to their mixed origins in Goa. Indeed, a Swastika on a home is non-existent in Sri Lanka. It sometimes appears in Hindu temples but not in homes.

It may also have been a tradition taken from Europe. In Europe, we also find this symbol (before the 20th century) in Conimbriga, a city in Coimbra that is a universal symbol found in Roman ruins. Coimbra is where Shirani de Silva's ancestors may have lived before migrating to India and Sri Lanka. Perhaps more importantly, given the assumed Royal roots of the de Silva clan, through the de Silva family as well as through the Carvalho family, one can find the Swastika on the floor of the Villa Romana la Olmeda in Palencia in Leon, to where indeed the de Silva family refer their royal roots.

As found at the Olupath House of Uduwara, sculptured heads are prevalent in Baroque art. In Asia, the Baroque appeared first in Goa, India, and later in Sri Lanka. For instance, in the church of Bom Jesus in Goa, sculptured heads are depicted similarly to the ones at the Olupathage in Uduwara in Sri Lanka. Also, the other ornaments, as described further, refer to Goa.

The early Portuguese literature on this matter also applies to the arrival of Karava people from India, with the Portuguese, through Goa and Mannar. The first Olupathage de Silva family was formed at Goa and migrated to Uduwara. They lived at the newly constructed fortress of Uduwara with local allies who also took the name Olupathage after the building was erected there. Indeed, the clan of Kuru descent must have adjusted to Sri Lankan customs for better integration and took a ge-name as is expected for Karava.

All the mixes are uncovered in autosomal DNA results, revealing Singhalese ancestors, Indians from Goa, and Portuguese. Note that all Sri Lankans ultimately come from India. As stated elsewhere, the Karava arrived in many migration waves from different Indian areas, the last during the Portuguese era.

54.9 Link with Goa in India

It is known that the Karava and Salagama arrived in Sri Lanka mainly from the 13th until the 16th century. They came from the Malabar coast, Kerala, and the Coromandel coast of India[22].

This influx appeared in pulses, the last during the Portuguese period when they brought clans from Goa, Cochin, and Calicut. In particular, the Karava clan, which would later become Olupathage and would, through mixed marriages with the Salagama, become members of the Salagama caste during the VOC period, was brought in from the Goa area in India, some of which were the descendants of a mixed marriage with a Portuguese de Silva. Indeed, the Salagamas, also known as Saliyas or Chalias, are found in Kerala adjacent to modern Goa, and they speak Kanada just like the Goans. We may assume that the old population of Uduwara in Sri Lanka, mostly Salagamas, descend from Goans. Interbreeding resulted in their having Portuguese ancestors. Simultaneously, the Olupathage de Silva are paternal descendants of Portuguese and have autosomal DNA from Goans and Portuguese through interbreeding. Additional mixing with locals naturally resulted in DNA traces of the other Singhalese in the area. Some recent insights from Zameer Khan on this matter can be read in Chapter 54.7.

Goan impressions from that era are shown in Figures 54.53, 54.54 and 54.55.

54.9.1 de Silva Governors of Goa

All the viceroys and governors of the Portuguese 'Estado da India' are shown in Figure 54.56. Here, we only focus on the ones of de Silva.

54.9.1.1 Pero da Silva

Pero da Silva (Pere de Silva y Rivera , Pedro de Silva, Peiris de Silva, Perez de Silva), Viceroy, 1635 - 1639 (dead at Goa in June 1639). He was a blood-relative of Shirani de Silva, as mentioned in Chapter 54.5.24.

54.9.1.2 Joao da Silva

Joao da Silva (Juan de Silva Telo y Meneses, conde de Aveiras), 1640 - 1644 (returned to Portugal) and again in 1651, but died at Mozambique en route to India. Juan de Silva Telo is also mentioned, for instance, by Jean Louis Hubert Simon[23], which focussed on the ongoing crisis at that time in Ceilao because Negombo had fallen. The Portuguese wanted to combat the VOC.

54.9.2 Other de Silvas in Goa

We added a list of de Silvas and Carvalhos who have been involved in the Portuguese conquest of Asia (mainly India) in the era covered by the books 'Decadas da Asia,' by Joao de Barros (1496-1570). This can be found in Chapter 61.3, where a brief recapitulation is given about the construction of the fort at Uduwara by Antonio Carvalho de Silva. Some images of interest in this context, taken at Goa, are shown in Figures 54.57, 54.58, 54.59, 54.60, 54.61 and 54.62. For Goa, we can list the following persons.

54.9.2.2 Edouard Sylva

54.9.2.3 Melchior de Sylva

Melchior de Sylva was a priest in Goa in 1597.[26]

54.9.2.4 Pedro de Sylva

Pedro de Sylva appeared in a reference on Goa in 1552, in the context of his role as former Governor of Malacca and in setting up trade between India, Trincomalee and China[27].

54.9.2.5 Juan de Silva, the ruler of Manila

Juan de Silva, a distinguished Spanish military leader and governor of the Philippines, held office from April 1609 until his death on April 19, 1616, in Malacca. Originating from the noble de Silva family, who remained in Iberia during the early 1600s, he was a descendant of Aires Gomes de Silva, akin to Shirani de Silva. Born in Trujillo, Extremadura, Spain, de Silva was a knight of the esteemed Order of Santiago.

De Silva assumed the position of governor and captain-general of the Philippines during Easter of 1609. Upon his arrival, he brought five additional companies of troops to reinforce the Spanish military presence in the region. His tenure was marked by significant military engagement, notably against Dutch forces in the Far East. His reputation for courage and steadfast resolve was well-earned during these conflicts.

In 1611, de Silva led an expedition to counter the Dutch presence in the Moluccas. Although the mission achieved limited success, it did manage to capture Sabougo on Gilolo and establish a fortification there. De Silva's overarching goal was to secure Portuguese assistance in expelling the Dutch from the region. In pursuit of this objective, he dispatched Cristobal de Azcueta, the former governor of Ternate, to Portuguese India in 1612 to coordinate with the Viceroy for a joint military operation. However, the expedition ended tragically with a shipwreck between Manila and Macao.

Undeterred, de Silva sent Jesuit ambassadors to Goa in another attempt to secure Portuguese support. By 1615, the envoys had successfully negotiated an agreement with the Portuguese Viceroy, who committed to providing four large galleons for the campaign in Malacca. Despite this arrangement, the Portuguese ships arrived later. Nevertheless, de Silva proceeded with his plan, against the advice of his officials, and set sail for Malacca on February 9, 1616. He commanded a formidable fleet of ten ships, four galleys, and several smaller vessels, with the 1,700-ton San Marcos serving as the flagship. The fleet carried 5000 men, including 2000 Spaniards and 500 Japanese troops, and was equipped with 300 cannons and accompanied by six Jesuits. This represented the largest European naval force seen in the region at the time.

The fleet's mission was to rendezvous with the Portuguese armada in the Strait of Malacca and subsequently attack Dutch positions in Java and the Moluccas. However, before their arrival, the Portuguese fleet was decimated by a Dutch attack near Malacca, leading to the destruction of their galleons. On February 25, 1616, de Silva's fleet reached the Strait of Singapore. He then dispatched Juan Gutierrez Paramo and part of the fleet to reinforce Ternate in the Moluccas.

Governor de Silva's health, already compromised, deteriorated rapidly, culminating in his death on April 19, 1616, in Malacca. Consequently, the Spanish expedition had to be abandoned without achieving its objectives against the Dutch. By June 1, 1616, the fleet returned to Manila, significantly depleted by disease and without engaging in significant combat.

Criticism of de Silva's strategy has been voiced by contemporaries and historians alike. Had he sailed directly to the Moluccas instead of Malacca, he might have dislodged the undermanned Dutch forces from the archipelago.

Juan de Silva was the son of Juan de Silva, who died in 1585, and the grandson of Luis I Pacheco de Silva (c. 1466-1470 – November 29, 1530). Luis was the son of Alfonso de Silva, Conde de Cifuentes (1429-1469), who in turn was the son of Juan I de Silva (1399-1464). This lineage traces back to Alfonso I Tenorio de Silva, the son of Aires Gomes de Silva (1315-1385), a common ancestor of Shirani de Silva. As detailed in Chapter 74.15, DNA evidence corroborates the presence of de Silva genes in regions where Juan de Silva conducted his expeditions.

54.9.2.6 Jeronimo de Silva, the ruler of the Moluccas

Jeronimo de Silva's tenure and influence in the Moluccas are extensively documented in Marco Ramerini's comprehensive work, The Spaniards in the Moluccas: 1606-1663/1671-1677. In particular, Chapter VI, titled "The Government of D. Jeronimo de Silva, March 1612 – April 1617," provides a detailed account of his administration.[28]

Jeronimo de Silva belonged to the prominent de Silva family, whose presence in Southeast Asia, particularly in Malacca, the Moluccas, and Timor, has left a lasting genetic legacy. This legacy is explored in Chapter 74.15, which examines the DNA evidence connecting the de Silva lineage to these regions.

De Silva arrived in Manila in June 1611, where he assumed the position of Governor of the Moluccas. Following the death of Don Juan de Silva, the Governor of the Philippines, Jeronimo de Silva, temporarily took on the role of Captain General of the Philippine Islands. This appointment was intended to bridge the gap until the Spanish monarchy could designate a new governor. Jeronimo de Silva appointed Juan Gutierrez Paramo as his successor before departing Ternate to assume his interim duties in the Philippines. However, shortly after de Silva's departure, Lucas de Vergara Gaviria, the successor appointed by the Audiencia, arrived in Manila. Jeronimo de Silva's withdrawal from Ternate likely occurred during the night of April 13th to 14th, 1617. The Spanish presence in the Moluccas was not confined to Ternate alone; they established temporary settlements on several other islands, including Halmahera, Morotai, Sulawesi, and Tidore.

This widespread Spanish influence, coupled with the de Silva family's presence, has resulted in shared DNA sequences between de Silva descendants and the local populations of these islands, likely originating from interactions and unions during the colonial period.

Marco Ramerini's research sheds light on the various locations within the region where the Spanish resided, notably the de Silva family.[29] In his work, Ramerini frequently refers to Jeronimo de Silva as Governor Don Geronimo de Silva. It delves into his extensive correspondence with the Spanish King, preserved in archival records.

These letters offer invaluable insights into the Spanish colonial administration's governance strategies, challenges, and geopolitical dynamics in the Moluccas during the early 17th century.

De Silva's administration in the Moluccas was marked by efforts to fortify Spanish control over the lucrative spice trade, a central focus of European colonial powers. His leadership contributed to establishing and maintaining Spanish forts and settlements, which were critical in asserting dominance over rival European and indigenous forces. The Spanish fortifications and administrative measures under de Silva's governorship exemplify the broader strategies employed by the Spanish Empire to secure and exploit their overseas territories.

Through his meticulous examination of primary sources, Ramerini provides a nuanced portrayal of Jeronimo de Silva's role and legacy in the Moluccas. The historical narrative constructed in The Spaniards in the Moluccas underscores the complexities and interconnections of colonial rule, highlighting the enduring impact of the de Silva family in Southeast Asia.

54.9.2.7 Jeronimo de Silva of Peru

Jerónimo de Silva, a notable Spanish conqueror, was born in 1518 in Valladolid, a significant center of learning and culture in Spain during the Renaissance. His early life in this vibrant city likely provided him with an education and exposure to the ambitions of Spanish exploration and conquest. Inspired by the tales of the New World and driven by the promise of wealth and prestige, Silva embarked on a journey to the Indies in 1539.

Arriving in Peru in 1541, Silva quickly integrated into the colonial society forged through cooperation and conflict. His marriage to Ana Cermeño in 1541 strategically aligned him with powerful colonial families. Ana Cermeño was the sister-in-law of the renowned conqueror Martín Pizarro and the sister of Pedro Cermeño, a key figure in the Gonzalo-Pizarrista movement, which sought to assert the authority of local conquerors over the central Spanish administration.

Silva's career was marked by involvement in colonial Peru's complex and often dangerous political landscape. During the Almagrista conspiracy, which led to the assassination of Governor Francisco Pizarro, Silva found himself in a precarious position. He resided in Lima during the conspiracy and found himself in perplexity and confinement alongside the colluding members of the Almagristas. The conspiracy reacted to Pizarro's governance and reflected deep divisions among the Spanish settlers. Silva's decision to flee Callao to Tumbes to rendezvous with Governor Vaca de Castro highlighted his strategic acumen and ability to navigate the volatile political environment.

Serving under Captain Peransúarez de Caporredondo, Silva abstained from participating in the Battle of Chupas in 1542, a significant conflict between the forces loyal to the Spanish Crown and the rebellious followers of Almagro. His absence from this battle perhaps indicates a cautious approach to engagement in disputes that did not align directly with his interests.

Silva's re-emergence in the colonial administration saw him serving under Viceroy Blasco Núñez de Vela. During this period, he was apprehended during the uprising led by the oidores in Lima, who were staunch advocates for perpetuating the encomienda system. This system granted Spanish colonists the right to extract labor and tribute from Indigenous peoples. Silva's capture and subsequent escape to Lunahuaná, where Gonzalo Monjarraz relentlessly pursued him, underscored the dangers those navigating the treacherous political waters of colonial Peru faced.

After the death of his first wife, Ana Cermeño, in 1562, Silva married Mariana de Ribera, the daughter of Nicolás de Ribera, also known as El Mozo. This marriage further strengthened his ties to influential colonial families. Silva's personal life was marked by alliances that bolstered his political and social standing, enabling him to play a significant role in the governance of Peru.

Silva assumed the position of mayor of Lima multiple times (1551, 1555, 1557, and 1559), demonstrating his sustained influence in the colonial administration. As mayor, he dealt with various challenges, including defending the encomenderos' interests. In 1552, he represented the city's encomenderos in their opposition to revoking the personal labor system imposed on the indigenous population. This contentious issue highlighted the tensions between colonial economic interests and the Spanish Crown's attempts to regulate the exploitation of indigenous labor.

Throughout his career, Silva took on roles as a mentor and advisor. He mentored Diego de Agüero El Mozo, a close companion, and in 1551, he became the teacher of Gaspar Centeno, the youngest offspring of the renowned conqueror Diego de Centeno. These mentoring relationships underscored Silva's commitment to nurturing the next generation of colonial leaders and his influence within the colonial elite.

Silva's defense of the encomenderos' interests brought him into direct conflict with the oidores, the royal judges and administrators in Lima. The oidores viewed the encomenderos' power as a threat to consolidating royal authority in the Indies. Silva's broad supplication to the King, defending the encomenderos, was met with a reprimand from the oidores, who argued for more specific grievances. This conflict illustrated the broader struggle between the semi-feudal encomendero oligarchy and the centralizing efforts of the Spanish Crown. The resentment arising from regulations about personal service, taxation, and tribute was so significant that a plot was devised to apprehend the oidores during the burial ceremony of Viceroy Antonio de Mendoza in 1552. Apprehending Martín de Robles, a conspirator, was assigned to Jerónimo de Silva, who accomplished this objective in Chincha rather than Arequipa.

Silva's military role was significant as well. In 1564, he captained a ship transporting men and supplies during the conflict against Francisco Hernández Girón. His leadership in the viceregal army continued until after the execution of Hernández Girón in 1554, marking a period of relative stability in the region. From 1559 until 1574, Silva held the position of permanent councilor of the city, playing a crucial role in its governance.

By collaborating with the viceroy Marqués de Cañete, he successfully obtained the position of mayor in the Holy Brotherhood by offering a sum of 1000 pesos. However, this appointment was later invalidated because the viceroy lacked the authority to make such appointments, as stated in the Royal Decree of May 4, 1562.

The viceroy Count of Nieva (1561) increased the number of indigenous people under Silva's care by including those from the regions of Huanchos, Totora, Chimata, Conde, Lipes, Sica-Sica, Yuayos, and Magdalena, who were formerly under the authority of hatuncuraca Gonzalo Taulichusco. Murmurs and interdictions hindered the implementation of his new directives.

In 1564, Silva composed a letter directed towards the King, wherein he presented recommendations for the effective governance of Peru. His acquaintance, the Dominican Archbishop Jerónimo de Loayza, commissioned and endorsed this correspondence. Viceroy Toledo appointed Silva as the overseer of Jauja and Huamanga. On July 1, 1572, Silva established the settlement that now encompasses the urban center known as Huancayo, which served as a precursor to the present-day metropolis. During a visit, he tragically succumbed to a fatal accident by falling into a ravine at Huamanga on March 17, 1574. His mortal remains were interred inside a chapel on his estate, specifically within the confines of the Convent of San Francisco de Lima.

Jerónimo de Silva's contributions to the colonial history of Peru are significant. His role in founding Huancayo, involvement in political and military affairs, and defense of the encomendero class highlight his influence in the Spanish conquest and colonization efforts. Silva's life was a microcosm of the broader conflicts and transformations that defined early colonial Peru, illustrating the interplay between ambition, loyalty, and power in the New World.

Silva's legacy exposes a turbulent history of Spanish colonization in South America.

54.10 The Particular Connection between Shirani de Silva, Francisco de Almeida and Lorenzo de Almeida

Francisco de Almeida, the first Viceroy of India, is intricately connected to the de Silva family through Don Aires Gomez de Silva. The Casa de Silva chronicles detail this connection, notably through Don Fernando II, Duke of Braga, who fathered Don Fernando III and Don Alvaro with Duchess Dona Juana de Castro. Don Fernando III married Dona Isabel, daughter of King Don Manuel (as illustrated in Figure 54.63), while Don Alvaro wed Dona Felipa de Melo.

Dona Felipa de Melo (d. 1516) was the daughter of Lord Rodrigo Alfonso de Melo (1430-1487) and Dame Dona Isabel de Meneses, herself the daughter of Don Aires Gomez de Silva and Brites de Meneses. Dona Felipa's eldest son, Don Rodrigo de Melo I (1468-1545), Marquis of...etc., married Dona Leonor de Almeida (b. 1470).

Dona Leonor de Almeida was the daughter of Francisco de Almeida, the first Viceroy of India, and Dona Juana Pereira. Francisco de Almeida was the son of Don Lope de Almeida and Dame Dina Beatriz de Silva, the latter being the daughter of Pere Gonzalez de Malasaya and Isabel Gomez de Silva (daughter of Juan Gomez de Silva and Margarita Coelho).

The aforementioned Don Aires Gomez de Silva (husband to Brites de Meneses) was the son of Juan Gomez de Silva (d. 1445) and Margarita Coelho. Juan Gomez de Silva was the son of Gonzalo Gomez de Silva (d. 1386) and Leonor Gonzales de Fonseca; he had two brothers, Diogo Gomez de Silva and Fernao de Silva. Gonzalo Gomez de Silva was a son of Juan Gomes de Silva and Constanza Gil de Joida. Before marrying Constanza, Juan Gomes de Silva was married to Senhorinha Alvares Redondo. Their eldest son, Aires Gomez (el Mozo) de Silva (1320-1365 or 1315-1385, depending on the source), married thrice, with his second marriage to Urraca Mendes Tenoria (b. 1332). Aires Gomez de Silva is an ancestor of Shirani de Silva, as detailed in Chapter 54.5.18.

Figure 54.66: When one lands or takes off at Singapore's Changi Airport, the sight of the bustling harbor and the adjacent Malacca Strait is impressive and telling. Singapore's strategic maritime location has enabled it to eclipse nearby Malacca in terms of economic and logistical significance. Despite being a mere 120 kilometers apart, the disparity in development and infrastructure between the two ports is stark. Singapore boasts state-of-the-art facilities, unparalleled accessibility, and a favorable fiscal environment, positioning it as a premier global maritime hub. This contrast underscores Singapore's ascendancy in regional and international trade networks. The author took a photograph accompanying this observation during a visit to Singapore in 2010, capturing a moment of reflection on the evolution of maritime commerce in Southeast Asia. However, it is essential to acknowledge that Malacca, while no longer the dominant port it once was, continues to operate and retains a measure of regional importance. Its historical legacy and ongoing role in maritime activities provide a nuanced perspective on the dynamic shifts within global trade routes. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Thus, Francisco de Almeida and his son Lorenzo de Almeida share a double bloodline connection to the de Silva family. Francisco de Almeida, also known as the Great Dom Francisco, was born in Lisbon around 1450 and died in 1510 at Table Bay, Cape of Good Hope. He was a Portuguese nobleman, soldier, and explorer. Before his tenure in India, he distinguished himself as a counselor to King Juan II of Portugal in the Conquest of Granada in 1492 and battles against the Moors. In 1505, he became the first governor and viceroy of the Portuguese State of India (Estado da Índia), establishing Portuguese dominance in the Indian Ocean.

His son, Lorenzo de Almeida, was also notable. Lorenzo extended Portuguese influence to Ceilao (Sri Lanka), exploring the coasts south of Colombo (Kalutara or Caltura near Uduwara) and establishing settlements. His first voyage to Ceilao was in 1505. Lorenzo died in 1508 in Chaul (India) at 28. After Lorenzo's death, Alfonso de Albuquerque (born 1509 in Alhandra, Portugal - dead 1515 in Goa, India) arrived at Cannanore (Kannur, India) in 1508 and succeeded Francisco de Almeida as Viceroy. Francisco de Almeida resisted initially, driven by a desire to avenge his son's death.

Francisco de Almeida's siblings included Joao de Almeida, Diogo Fernandes de Almeida, Jorge de Almeida, Pedro de Almeida, Fernando de Almeida, Isabel de Silva, and Branca de Almeida. Francisco married twice, first to Brites Pereira and then Joanna Pereira, fathering two sons named Lorenzo de Almeida. It is speculated that one son died young, prompting the naming of a subsequent son with the same name. This second son is the one noted for his ventures in Sri Lanka. It is possible that Diogo de Almeida served as an emissary for Lorenzo de Almeida during his visit to Sri Lanka.

The tombs of de Almeida and da Silva in Goa are depicted in Figures 54.63 and 54.64.

54.11 Early Presence of de Silvas in Sri Lanka

For readers unfamiliar with the Indian subcontinent, we present a satellite photo in Figure 54.65 to provide geographical context.

In M. G. Francis's book,[31], the de Silvas first appear early in the Portuguese period of the island.

Historical evidence shows that while they never played the most prominent roles in the country, they were involved in trade, religion, and, to some extent, military affairs. However, a few notable exceptions are documented in the following texts and narratives.

Notably, Antonio Carvalho de Silva, Shirani de Silva's paternal ancestor, played a significant role in fortifying Portuguese territories with Samara de Cunha y Rala (also known as Samarakoon), particularly constructing a stone fortress at Uduwara.

Chapter 11 of Francis's book is dedicated to the events involving Donna Catherina, a Singhalese princess. It documents that Don Francisco de Silva was the military commander of Colombo in 1587, typically leading military interventions. However, a nobleman passing through Sri Lanka from Malacca to Goa, Don Pere Lopez de Sousa, assumed control due to his higher noble rank and a more significant number of soldiers, leading to Don Francisco de Silva's disapproval.

Several other de Silvas are mentioned in various capacities.

Don Juan de Silva, Don Edouardo de Silva, and Emmanuel de Silva were priests. Dom Diogo de Silva, a priest, was ordered to defend Colombo's fortress around 1630, despite not being a military man, as he was the only suitable option available.

[31] M. G. Francis, 'History of Ceylon, an abridged translation of Prof. Peter Courtenay's work,' Mangalore, Printed at the Codialbail Press, 1913, ISBN 81-206-1406-2.

The Viceroy Joan de Silva Tellez de Menezes, Count of Aveiras, landed at Goa in September 1640 with the duty of organizing further defense of Sri Lanka against the Dutch. Additionally, Salvador Pereira de Silva, a Portuguese military commander, was stationed at the fortress of Corvite (Kuruvita) in 1596, which is located between Uduwara and Adam's Peak, 50 km east of Horana. O. M. da Silva Cosme[32] references numerous de Silvas and Carvalhos.

For instance, a certain Carvalho was the factor of Colombo in 1546. Luis de Carvalho, a cousin of Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, was blood-related to Antonio Carvalho de Silva, Shirani's ancestor, explaining the DNA trace to Aquitaine in France, likely through the Kingdom of Navarre.

Both Francis and Da Silva Cosme mention that around 1598, Salvador Pereyra de Silva became de Acevedo's captain-major of the army, alongside Gaspar Correa, tasked with establishing camps on the frontiers.

Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala was in Matara, overseeing the south, while Lourenço Perez de Carvalho was responsible for Galle, facing the prince of Uva.

In April 1600, reinforcements from Goa arrived, and Azevedo requested Antonio de Silva (Antonio Carvalho de Silva) and Samara de Cunha y Rala to open new frontlines on Uva's frontiers.

Salvador Pereira de Silva also conducted counter-attacks on the Kandyans. Simao Correa escaped to Kandy by bribing a lascarin, receiving the name Navaratne Bandara, and was eventually captured by Salvador Pereyra de Silva. Salvador continued successful campaigns, subduing Sabaragamuwa, but was eventually trapped in Kuruvita Temple, which he later escaped.

In August 1611, the Kandyans were attacked again by an army of lascarins and around 700 Portuguese, many from Goa. The campaign included the dissawas of Matara and the Seven Korales, Domingos Carvalho Cam, Luis Gomes Pinto, and Luis Cabral de Faria.

Domingos Carvalho Cam became captain of Balana, in Chapter 56, with 250 Portuguese soldiers and 1000 lascarins. Azevedo then rushed to Colombo, where Senarat was approaching with soldiers to conquer the city. Carvalho Cam thwarted Senarat with a surprise attack, causing the Kandyans to flee.

According to Azevedo, Goa did not adequately supply Carvalho Cam, which focused on Malacca, besieged by the VOC in 1606 and embroiled in the Achin war. Malacca then held strategic importance comparable to modern-day Singapore, as illustrated in Figure 54.66.

Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala successfully fought at Orutota and Alutkuru Korale.

Aritta Kivendu Perumal, the Sitawaka army commander, repelled a combined force of lascarins and Portuguese.

The commander in chief of the Kotte army, Diogo de Silva, was killed in battle, while the Portuguese commander Francisco de Silva Castelhano narrowly escaped. In some instances, Francisco de Silva Castelhano was kidnapped and then released. There is also a reference to 'De Souza' joining forces at the foot of Kandy with Francisco de Silva Arcalaos.

Da Silva Cosme describes that the Portuguese preferred Dona Catherina to become the Queen of Kandy over the young King Dom Joao. They intended for her to marry a Portuguese, making him the King of Kandy.

Queiroz wrote that the groom was Francisco de Silva, Portuguese India's most handsome young man. However, Francisco returned to Manar before the final battle and drowned when his ship sank on the way back to India.

Another candidate to marry Dona Catherina was Jayavira's cousin. Later, Domingos Correa and Francisco de Silva were appointed to control the Seven Korales, while Samara de Cunha y Rala was allocated Rayigam Korale. At Bocolagama, mudaliyar Attapatu took up arms against Correa but was defeated. Consequently, Correa, along with Duarte Peyxota de Silva, swiftly conquered Denavaka.

In 1589, Samara de Cunha y Rala, or Samarakoon, and Duarto Peyxoto de Silva were sent to Denawaka to resist the Portuguese. However, they diverted to Menikkadawara, where the captain-general resided.

In 1583, notable figures such as Friar Duarte de Silva and Luis Corea de Silva were mentioned.

Sitawaka was besieged at some point, and on March 23, 1603, captain-major Pereira de Silva saved Sitawaka with 11 Portuguese companies and 200 lascarins.

Around April 15, 1603, Captain Francisco Maçedo de Silva surrendered the fortress of Talampitiya to 10000 Kandyan troops, as the situation had become untenable.

When the Portuguese finally discovered a route around Africa, circumventing the intermediary Muslim traders who obstructed their access to Asia, new opportunities emerged for India, Sri Lanka, and, naturally, Portugal.

It is important to note that Sri Lanka was not a unified country but an island comprising several kingdoms. The most prominent was the Kingdom of Kotte, located along the southwestern coast. This kingdom eventually allied with the Portuguese, who, over time, integrated it into their empire through feudal inheritance.

The author explores the genetic, historical, and cultural connections between the Sri Lankans and the Portuguese. It is important to acknowledge that some of the facts presented are controversial, especially given the rise of nationalism in Sri Lanka and the impact of the civil war, which has prompted a reevaluation of the nation's history. The historiographical approach to Sri Lanka's past has significantly changed since the Portuguese era and over the past century. A notable example of this is the work of Chandra R. de Silva, whose study on this evolution is highly recommended by the author. ootnote Chandra R. de Silva, "Portugal and Sri Lanka: Recent Trends in Historiography", in Re-exploring the Links: History and Constructed Histories between Portugal and Sri Lanka, ed. Jorge Flores, Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz Verlag, 2007, pp. 3-26.

55.2 The Rulers of Kotte and Successors of Interest

Our journey into the world of 16th-century Sri Lanka, the world that the Portuguese encountered, begins with a brief overview of the rulers of that period. This period is significant as it marks the arrival of the Portuguese, a pivotal event in Sri Lankan history.

Figure 55.4: 2007, Maurice Declercq and Anna-Laura were in the hilly country of the Kingdom of Kandy, between the city and Nuwara Eliya, in Sri Lanka. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Sri Lanka was a beautiful island that consisted of different kingdoms and principalities. Indeed, the Kingdom of Kotte was the largest on the island and was what the Portuguese would call Ceilao. People of Kotte probably spoke Singhala when the Portuguese arrived, and most were Buddhist. The second-largest kingdom was Kandy, which mainly consisted of the hill country. The Kandyans were also predominantly Buddhist and spoke Sinhalese.

There was also the Jaffna Kingdom. Although it played an essential role for the Portuguese, it did not notably influence the relationship between the Portuguese and the Kotte Kingdom. Therefore, we shall not focus on Jaffna, the Northern Kingdom, which the Portuguese called Yalapalan, Yapane or Jaffnapatam. The population there mostly spoke Tamil, and their religion was mainly Hindu.

The traditional caste system further subdivided the three kingdoms, while 'language' did not necessarily equate to 'race.'

Numerous historical works substantiate the extensive migrations from India throughout history and within Sri Lanka, highlighting that people often adopted the local language upon relocation.

The Kings of Kotte, descendants of the ancient rulers of Polonnaruwa and Anuradhapura, were also referred to as Chakravarti, or emperors of Sri Lanka.

The northern boundary of Kotte extended beyond Puttalam, reaching south to Pomparippu, while the Four Korales lay to the north of Kotte, positioned between the Northern Kingdom and its border.

The West acknowledged the existence of Sri Lanka even before the Portuguese discovery. Archaeological evidence attests to the contact between Sri Lanka and the Romans.[1].

55.2.1 Dharma Parakramabahu IX of Kotte

He reigned from 1508 until 1528 and was the son of Vira Parakramabahu VIII. The latter is also known as Ambulagala Kumara.

55.2.2 Vijayabahu of Kotte

Vijayabahu of Kotte, a significant figure in the history of Sri Lanka, assumed the throne following the demise of his brother, Parakramabahu IX of Kotte. His reign, which spanned from 1513 to 1521, was a crucial period in the kingdom's history.

Despite the people's inclination towards his half-brother Sakalakala Valla, it was Vijayabahu who was crowned king in 1513, thereby averting any immediate dispute over succession.

Vijayabahu's reign and family dynamics significantly impacted the subsequent history of the Kingdom of Kotte.

He had two wives: his first wife, Anula Kahatuda, bore him three sons—Bhuvanekabahu, Mayadunne, and Maha Raigam Bandara. His second wife, a queen from Kiravella, gave birth to Deva Rajasinghe.

Influenced by his second queen, Vijayabahu intended to place her son on the throne after his death. This plan involved the assassination of his three sons from his first marriage, a scheme that was never realized and ultimately led to a turbulent period for the kingdom.

The three sons of Vijayabahu played pivotal roles in the kingdom's future. They orchestrated the infamous event known as the Vijayabahu kollaya (the spoiling of Vijayabahu).

King Jaya Vira II of Kandy, who had married Mayadunne's cousin, provided sanctuary and military support to the three brothers, enabling them to retaliate against their father. Although the kingdom teetered on the brink of war, the people of Kotte were unwilling to engage in conflict against either their king or the princes. Instead, personal retaliations ensued, culminating in Vijayabahu's assassination by a Muslim named Salman, hired by the Sinhalese, who were bound by custom not to kill their king with their own hands.

Following Vijayabahu's demise, the Kingdom of Kotte was divided into three parts, marking a significant shift in the kingdom's power dynamics.

The eldest son, Bhuvanekabahu, retained the largest portion and continued to rule a diminished Kotte as King Bhuvanekabahu VII. His brothers, Mayadunne and Raigam Bandara assumed Sitawaka and Raigama's thrones, respectively.

After Raigam Bandara's death, Mayadunne seized control of Raigama, ruling both Sitawaka and Raigama, and directly challenging his brother Bhuvanekabahu's authority over Kotte. There are speculations that Mayadunne may have played a covert role in the assassination of their father, King Vijayabahu of Kotte.

This period of Sri Lankan history is marked by intense familial strife, political intrigue, and shifting allegiances.

55.2.3 Bhuvanaikabahu VII of Kotte

Bhuvanaikabahu VII of Kotte, born in 1468, was a pivotal figure in Sri Lanka's history. He reigned from 1521 until his assassination in 1551. He was the son of King Vijayabahu of Kotte and Anula Kahatuda.

His reign was marked by intense political and military struggles, particularly with his brothers Mayadunne, who became the King of Sitawaka, and Rayigam Bandara, who ruled Raigama.

Upon the death of Rayigam Bandara, Mayadunne annexed his kingdom and persistently contested Bhuvanaikabahu VII's rule over Kotte. This period was characterized by ongoing conflicts between Bhuvanaikabahu VII and Mayadunne, often involving Mayadunne's son, Rajasinghe I.

These internal conflicts were exacerbated by external pressures, most notably from the Portuguese, with whom Bhuvanaikabahu VII eventually allied to protect his kingdom. The alliance was a strategic move against Mayadunne and Rajasinghe I and a defense against external threats such as the Zamorin of Calicut and his alliance with the Moors.

In the mid-16th century, Bhuvanaikabahu VII had a significant encounter with Francis Xavier, shown in Figure 55.2, the renowned Jesuit missionary. This meeting revealed Bhuvanaikabahu's personal interest in Christianity, a complex dynamic in a kingdom with diverse religious beliefs.

He sought Portuguese protection without the necessity of converting, a request that underscores the intricate interplay between politics and religion in his reign. Despite the efforts of Francis Xavier and Antonio Barreto, the King remained unconverted.

The end of Bhuvanaikabahu VII's reign was a tragic one, marked by his assassination on December 29, 1550. While some historians suggest that the Portuguese were responsible for his murder, the more plausible theory implicates his brother Mayadunne, who was driven by a desire to claim the throne of Kotte.

The King left no male heir; however, his daughter Samudra Devi had a son, who ascended to the throne at a young age, continuing the lineage of the Kotte dynasty.

[1] The author has not studied this evidence.

Bhuvanaikabahu VII's reign is a testament to the turbulent period in Sri Lankan history marked by fraternal rivalry, strategic alliances with European powers, and cultural and religious complexities. His interactions with significant figures such as Francis Xavier highlight the broader global context within which these local struggles took place.

55.2.4 Dom Joao Dharmapala Peria Bandara of Kotte

Dom Joao Dharmapala Peria Bandara of Kotte, the grandson of Bhuvanaikabahu VII of Kotte, succeeded his grandfather as the last King of Kotte. Born Dharmapala Bandara, he adopted the Portuguese first name Joao upon his baptism, signifying his conversion to Christianity. This conversion was not solely religious but also a strategic act of subjugation to the Portuguese to secure his kingdom.

The Portuguese played a pivotal role in the Kingdom of Kotte, providing crucial protection against external threats from Mayadunne and the Zamorin of Calicut. Their significance extended beyond military alliances, as they were instrumental in ensuring the economic security of Kotte within the intricate commercial networks of Southeast Asia. The alliance with the Portuguese was therefore not just a matter of stability, but also a key factor in the kingdom's economic prosperity during a turbulent period.

Joao Dharmapala's reign came to a definitive end with his death on May 27, 1597, at the Portuguese Fort of Colombo, located within his Kingdom of Kotte. His marriages to Dona Catherina, Dona Margarida, and Dona Isabel were significant alliances. However, his demise marked a profound shift in the political landscape, as the independent Kingdom of Kotte was no more. It was now known as Portuguese Kotte, Portuguese Ceylon, or simply Ceilao. The vacuum left by his death was filled by the emergence of the de Silva family, who would go on to play a significant role in the history of Sri Lanka.

This transition period was characterized by significant changes in Sri Lanka's political and cultural landscape. The Portuguese's influence extended beyond mere military and economic aspects, as they also left a lasting impact on the island's social and religious fabric. The end of Joao Dharmapala's reign and the subsequent integration of Kotte into the Portuguese colonial empire signify a critical juncture in Sri Lankan history, marking the beginning of a new era of foreign dominance that would shape the island's future for centuries to come.

55.2.5 Mayadunne of Sitawaka

Mayadunne of Sitawaka was the brother of Bhuvanaikabahu VII of Kotte. He held the title of King of Sitawaka and later of Raigama. His legacy is critical to understanding the resistance against colonial powers, as he and his descendants posed a persistent threat to the Portuguese and later the Dutch East India Company (VOC). Although Mayadunne never reigned over Kotte, his influence and actions mark him as a prominent figure in Sri Lankan history.

During the rise of Sinhalese nationalism, a period characterized by intense efforts among the Sinhalese to assert their cultural and political identity, Mayadunne was celebrated as a hero for his defiance against the Portuguese. This era saw every Sinhalese striving to be more ardently patriotic than their neighbors, and Mayadunne's opposition to foreign domination earned him admiration and respect.

Geographically, Raigama corresponds to the present-day Southern Province and the Kalutara District, excluding its coastline, with Uduwara marking its boundary.

Sitawaka, now known as Avissawella, encompassed what is currently the Sabaragamuwa Province, specifically the Kegalle and Ratnapura districts.

A pivotal event in Mayadunne's reign was the smuggling of the Sacred Tooth Relic of Buddha from Kotte to Sitawaka by Buddhist monks. This act was driven by the belief that the relic would be safer with Mayadunne, who opposed the Portuguese, rather than in Kotte, which had become a vassal state under Christian Portuguese rule. According to Sri Lankan traditions, the kingdom in possession of the Sacred Tooth Relic held supremacy over other kingdoms on the island, thus asserting its dominance.

One of the significant military engagements during Mayadunne's time was the Battle of Mulleriyawa. This battle saw the forces of Mayadunne and his son Rajasinghe clash with the Portuguese army. The Portuguese suffered a decisive defeat, which curtailed their ambitions of conquering the entire island. This victory not only bolstered Mayadunne's position but also marked a turning point in the resistance against Portuguese colonization efforts.

Mayadunne died in 1581 at the age of 80, leaving behind a legacy of resistance and national pride. His actions and the subsequent reverence for his defiance against foreign powers underscore his importance in Sri Lanka's historical narrative.

55.2.6 Tikiri Bandara or Rajasingha I of Sitawaka

Tikiri Bandara, later known as Rajasingha I of Sitawaka, was a prominent figure in Sri Lankan history. Born as Tikiri Bandara, he earned the name Rajasingha (meaning 'King of Lions') due to his bravery in the Battle of Mulleriyawa against the Portuguese. His reign is subject to debate, with records suggesting it began in 1578, when his father Mayadunne transferred power to him, or in 1581, following Mayadunne's death. Rajasingha I's reign continued until 1592.

One significant aspect of Rajasingha I's rule is the controversial and disputed account of him killing his father, Mayadunne. This alleged patricide reportedly caused friction with Buddhist leaders, as Rajasingha I purportedly opposed Buddhism after his father's death. The rumor of this patricidal act was notably mentioned by Dutch traveler Joris van Spilbergen, who visited Sri Lanka later. However, it remains uncertain whether Rajasingha I committed this act.

Rajasingha I's conversion from Buddhism to Hinduism significantly shifted his policies and religious affiliations. He became an anti-Buddhist ruler, responsible for the destruction of numerous Buddhist religious sites and the establishment of Hindu temples, including at the sacred site of Sri Pada. His actions profoundly impacted the religious landscape of Sri Lanka during his reign.

Rajasingha I was also a formidable military leader and strategist. In 1582, he successfully annexed the Kingdom of Kandy to the Kingdom of Sitawaka. Earlier, in 1565, he had annexed the northern regions of Kotte. By 1587, his kingdom had expanded to include the coastal area around Matara in the south, the region just east of the town of Kotte, and the coastal areas between Negombo and Kalpitiya. Consequently, the Kingdom of Kotte, later Portuguese Ceylon, was reduced to a narrow coastal strip approximately 50 kilometers wide, stretching from Negombo to Galle, along with the Kalpitiya peninsula.

Rajasingha I's reign was marked by territorial expansion and significant religious and cultural shifts, leaving a lasting legacy on Sri Lanka's history.

55.2.7 Vimaladharmasuriya I of Kandy and Nikapitiya Bandara of Sitawaka, a.k.a. Dom Felipe

55.2.7.1 Vimaladharmasuriya I of Kandy

Tikiri Bandara was the king of a vast kingdom that encompassed almost the entire island of Sri Lanka, except for the north and the narrow strip along the southwest coast known as the Kingdom of Kotte. Upon his death in 1592, he was succeeded by Vimaladharmasuriya I of Kandy.

Vimaladharmasuriya I reigned from 1592 until 1604 and was succeeded by Senarat of Kandy. He was married to Kusumasana Devi. The lineage and reasons for Vimaladharmasuriya I's succession are unclear. Some historical sources suggest that his father was a Kandyan chieftain named Virasundara Mudiyanse of Peradeniya.

Vimaladharmasuriya I had several pseudonyms, including Konappu Bandara, Don Joao of Austria (after being baptized in Goa following his escape from Sri Lanka during Tikiri Bandara's invasion of Kandy), and Don Juan Appuhamy. These names suggest a complex history, possibly referring to different periods in his life or even different individuals. It is generally accepted that his mother was Kosbokke Gedara Vimalu, after whom he took the name Vimaladharmasuriya.

Known to the Portuguese as Dom Joao of Austria, Vimaladharmasuriya I married Dona Catherina in 1594. This marriage was supported by the Portuguese, who presented him as the legitimate successor to the Kandyan throne. After renouncing Christianity and converting to Buddhism, he constructed a shrine for the Sacred Tooth Relic in Kandy, in Figure 51.2. This act was significant as it established Kandy, where his palace was, as the capital of all kingdoms in Sri Lanka.

Vimaladharmasuriya I's reign saw significant interactions with foreign powers. He allied with the Dutch through Joris van Spilbergen to combat the Portuguese. This alliance, mediated by Sebald de Weert and Admiral Wybrand van Warwijck, ultimately failed due to cultural misunderstandings and insults, resulting in the death of de Weert and 47 Dutchmen. However, a more successful alliance was formed in 1612 between the VOC (Dutch East India Company) and the Kingdom of Kandy, established by Marcellus de Boschouwer with Senarat of Kandy, Vimaladharmasuriya I's successor.

Vimaladharmasuriya I played a crucial role in the revival of Buddhism in Sri Lanka. His predecessor, Tikiri Bandara, had nearly eradicated Buddhism on the island. Vimaladharmasuriya I's conversion to Buddhism led him to import monks from Lower Burma to revitalize the religion. He also moved the Sacred Tooth Relic to Kandy from its previous hiding place at Delgamuwa Raja Maha Vihara in the Sabaragamuwa Province, solidifying Kandy's status as a religious center.

The Dutch, who had established a settlement in Japan since 1609, were well-known for their trade relations rather than religious missions. This settlement, initially located in Hirado on Kyushu and later moved to Nagasaki in 1641, facilitated trade between Europe and Asia. The Japanese tolerated the VOC due to their lack of religious agendas and their role in providing valuable information and trade goods. Despite the limited cultural exchange, the Dutch presence in Japan marked a significant period of interaction between the East and West. The author stayed several times in Japan, as illustrated in Figures 55.3.

In summary, Vimaladharmasuriya I of Kandy was a pivotal figure in Sri Lanka's history. His reign marked a period of religious revival, strategic alliances, and significant political maneuvers that shaped the island's future. His efforts to restore Buddhism and establish Kandy as a central kingdom had lasting impacts still evident in Sri Lanka today.

55.2.7.2 Nikapitiya Bandara of Sitawaka

In the late 16th century, the political landscape of Sri Lanka was marked by significant upheaval and power struggles. Following the death of King Rajasinghe I, the Kingdom of Kandy saw the ascension of Vimaladharmasuriya I. Concurrently, Nikapitiya Bandara rose to power as the King of Sitawaka. His reign, however, was short-lived and tumultuous. Nikapitiya Bandara's military commander, Aritta Kivendu Perumal, played a pivotal role in the kingdom's military and political affairs. Originating from Waddakuru in India, Aritta Kivendu Perumal brought a wealth of experience and a strategic mindset. His role extended beyond military command as he also served as the regent, leveraging his influence in the kingdom's governance.

The involvement of Maha Biso Bandara, the sister of the late King Rajasinghe I and the widow of Vidiya Bandara, further consolidated the regency. Maha Biso Bandara's political acumen and familial connections provided a semblance of stability in the otherwise volatile political environment of Sitawaka.

However, the stability of Sitawaka was soon threatened by external forces. The Kingdom of Kotte, emboldened by internal strife within Sitawaka, launched a series of campaigns to annex the territory. The ensuing conflict saw the gradual erosion of Sitawaka's power.

Amidst these turbulent times, Aritta Kivendu Perumal, capitalizing on the chaos, orchestrated a coup against Nikapitiya Bandara. Seizing the throne, Aritta Kivendu Perumal adopted the royal title of King Jayavira Bandara, thereby consolidating his authority over Sitawaka.

However, Nikapitiya Bandara's fate took a dramatic turn following his overthrow. Captured by the Portuguese, he was taken to Colombo, where he underwent baptism and received the Christian name Dom Felipe.

Recognizing the potential of leveraging him as a political pawn, the Portuguese sent him to Goa for further education. His journey continued to Portugal, where he was poised to enter the University of Coimbra, a prestigious institution known for its academic rigor. Tragically, Nikapitiya Bandara's life was cut short when he died in 1608, just as he was on the cusp of beginning his educational pursuits.

The stories of Nikapitiya Bandara and Aritta Kivendu Perumal are testaments to the complex and often turbulent nature of monarchical successions and the impact of foreign interventions on shaping the region's historical trajectory.

55.2.8 Senarat of Kandy

Senarat of Kandy was a pivotal figure in Sri Lanka's history, particularly during the early 17th century. He ruled the Kingdom of Kandy, in Figure 55.4, from 1604 until he died in 1635. Succeeding Vimaladharmasuriya I, Senarat's reign was a transitional period marked by internal consolidation and external conflict, notably with the Portuguese.

Senarat was married to Dona Catherina, the widow of Vimaladharmasuriya I, which strengthened his claim to the throne. His other marriages to Suriya Devi and Sama Devi, both daughters of the former king and Dona Catherina, further solidified his political alliances within the royal family. These strategic marriages ensured a continuity of power and stability within the Kandyan court.

Senarat's rule was challenged by ongoing conflicts with the Portuguese, who were intent on expanding their control over Sri Lanka. During his reign, the Portuguese managed to reconquer significant territories from Kandy, showcasing the persistent threat they posed. Senarat was not renowned for his military prowess, unlike some of his predecessors and successors. His reign is often characterized by the strategic, albeit sometimes passive, resistance to Portuguese advances rather than outright military victories.

Despite these challenges, Senarat maintained his rule until he died in 1635. He was succeeded by his son, Rajasinghe II of Kandy, who would later play a more aggressive role in resisting Portuguese influence. Senarat had other children, including Vijayapala and Kumarasinghe, who also held significant positions within the kingdom.

It is speculated that Senarat might have been a cousin of Vimaladharmasuriya I, which would explain his ascension to the throne following Vimaladharmasuriya I's death. This familial connection would have provided his rule an additional layer of legitimacy.

Senarat of Kandy's leadership, though not marked by military victories, played a crucial role in maintaining the sovereignty of the Kingdom of Kandy during a tumultuous period in Sri Lankan history.

55.2.9 Rajasinha II of Kandy

Rajasinha II of Kandy was the son of King Senarat of Kandy and Dona Catherina of Kandy, the widow of King Vimaladharmasuriya I of Kandy.

His reign, which spanned from 1635 to 1687, was marked by political intrigue and shifting alliances against the backdrop of European colonial ambitions in Asia. His seat of power was located in Senkadagala, now known as the city of Kandy.

The period of Rajasinha II's rule coincided with the rise of the Dutch East India Company (VOC) as a dominant power in Asia. The Dutch, having established a stronghold in Batavia (modern-day Jakarta), sought to curtail the influence of Portuguese Goa. This strategic goal aligned with the interests of the Kingdom of Kandy, leading to an alliance between the two entities against their common enemy, the Portuguese. In 1638, Rajasinha II signed an agreement with Adam Westerwolt of the VOC, marking the beginning of a collaborative effort to expel the Portuguese from Sri Lanka.

The alliance bore fruit with the capture of Batticaloa, the main port of the Kingdom of Kandy, in 1639. Following this, the Dutch, with Kandyan support, continued their military campaigns against the Portuguese, successfully seizing Galle in 1640. However, the geopolitical landscape in Europe influenced the course of events in Sri Lanka. The conclusion of the Eighty Years' War in Europe created a complex dynamic as the VOC, now recognizing an opportunity to further their interests, contemplated collaboration with the Portuguese, who were at that time united with the Spanish crown.

The alliance between the Dutch and the Sinhalese was disrupted by 1638, leading to a protracted period of conflict between the Sri Lankans and the VOC. Despite this setback, a new coalition was formed between the Kandyans and the Dutch in 1649, though this, too, was fraught with duplicity. The Treaty of Münster in 1648, which formally recognized the Netherlands as an independent state, emboldened the VOC's colonial ambitions. Their commitment to commercial dominance often led to treacherous actions, undermining their agreements with local powers.

Despite these betrayals, the Kandyans persisted in their efforts to drive out the Portuguese, relying on Dutch support. By 1656, the Dutch had achieved their objective, having ousted the Portuguese from their strongholds in Sri Lanka. However, once the Portuguese threat was eliminated, the Dutch reneged on their promises to the Kandyans, pushing them back to their highland territories without granting any territorial gains. This betrayal ignited further conflict, with the Kandyans now turning their resistance efforts towards the Dutch occupiers.

The narrative of Rajasinha II's era is one of resilience and strategic maneuvering in the face of colonial exploitation.

The Kandyans' continued resistance against foreign domination, first against the Portuguese and then against the Dutch, underscores the complexity of Sri Lanka's colonial history. While this summary focuses on the interactions with the Dutch and the Portuguese, it sets the stage for subsequent chapters that delve into the arrival of the de Silva family and the construction of the Fortress of Uduwara, highlighting the intricate web of alliances and conflicts that shaped the region.

Chapter 56

The Strategic Strongholds of Balana, Thumpana, and Deewalkanda

56.1 Introduction

To fully grasp the narrative explored in this book about Portuguese Ceylon and the role of Shirani's ancestors, it is essential to provide some background on the strategic strongholds of Balana, Thumpana, and Deewalkanda.

The history of Sri Lanka during the Portuguese colonial period is marked by a series of fierce and strategic resistances led by the indigenous kingdoms. Among the various sites of conflict, Balana, Thumpana, and Deewalkanda stand out as significant battlegrounds where the determination and strategic understanding of the Sinhalese leaders were vividly demonstrated. Each location, with its unique geographical and strategic attributes, played pivotal roles in the resistance against Portuguese incursions and contributed to the broader struggle to preserve the island's sovereignty and cultural heritage.

Balana, located within the Alagalla Mountain Range in the Central Province, served as a vital defensive outpost for the Kandyan Kingdom. Its formidable fortress and strategic positioning along the Kadugannawa Pass made it a key site for monitoring and controlling access to the kingdom. The battles fought here were characterized by the effective use of natural defenses, showcasing the military ingenuity of the Kandyan rulers.

Thumpana, situated within the rugged terrain of the Central Province, was another crucial site of resistance. The engagements at Thumpana highlighted the use of guerrilla tactics and strategic ambushes by the Sinhalese forces against the Portuguese. The region's challenging topography provided a significant advantage to the local defenders, allowing them to mount a fierce resistance that contributed to the eventual decline of Portuguese power on the island.

Deewalkanda, a prominent rock formation in Uduwara along the Kalu Ganga, was a natural fortress for local leaders such as Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, better known as Samarakoon. The battles fought here exemplified the use of the local geography to orchestrate surprise attacks and defensive maneuvers. The resistance at Deewalkanda played a significant role in disrupting Portuguese supply lines and troop movements, further weakening their hold on the region.

The stories of Balana, Thumpana, and Deewalkanda provide a compelling narrative of resilience and strategic brilliance. These sites, each with unique challenges and tactical advantages, underscore the enduring spirit of resistance among the Sinhalese people. This chapter delves into the historical significance of these battlegrounds, exploring the strategies employed, the battles fought, and the legacy left behind by the fierce defenders of Sri Lanka's sovereignty.

56.2 Balana: A Strategic Outpost in the Alagalla Mountains

Balana, a village nestled in the Alagalla Mountain Range in Sri Lanka's Central Province, holds significant historical importance due to its strategic location and its role in the defense of the Kandyan Kingdom. This village, located within the Kandy District, is renowned for its formidable Balana Fort, shown in Figure 56.1. It was a critical military outpost during the Portuguese period and subsequent colonial eras. The fortress, perched on the rocky terrain between the Kadugannawa Pass and the Alagalla Mountain Range, exemplifies the military ingenuity of the Kandyan Kingdom and its efforts to thwart foreign invasions.

56.2.1 The Strategic Importance of Balana Fort

The Balana Fort was constructed to serve as a defensive bulwark for the Kandyan Kingdom, particularly against the incursions of European colonial powers. During the Portuguese period, the fort's strategic placement made it essential to the kingdom's defense system. The Alagalla mountains provided a natural barrier, and the fort's location offered a commanding view of the surrounding terrain, allowing the Kandyans to monitor and control access through the Kadugannawa Pass.

This region's rugged topography and dense forest cover made it difficult for invading forces to navigate, providing the Kandyans with a significant tactical advantage. The fortifications at Balana were crucial in repelling Portuguese attempts to penetrate the heart of the Kandyan Kingdom. The fort's robust construction and strategic location exemplify the era's military architecture and strategic planning, reflecting the Kandyan rulers' understanding of the terrain and using natural defenses to protect their sovereignty.

56.2.2 The Kadugannawa Pass: Gateway to the Kandyan Kingdom

The Kadugannawa Pass, located near Kadugannawa town in the Central Province, is another significant geographical feature that played a vital role in the history of Sri Lanka. Before the British constructed a road through this pass, it was a lookout point and a natural defense line for the Kandyan Kingdom. The pass lies along the Alagalla Mountain Range and is surrounded by prominent peaks such as Ambuluwawa, Knuckles, and Hanthana, further fortifying the region.

Historically, the pass was a critical gateway to the island's interior. Its steep inclines and narrow pathways made it a formidable obstacle for invading armies. The Kandyans exploited these geographical features to create a series of defensive positions, with Balana Fort being the most prominent among them. The fort's location near the pass allowed the Kandyans to monitor and control movement, making it difficult for any foreign power to advance without encountering significant resistance.

56.2.3 Portuguese Incursions and Battles at Balana

During the Portuguese period, several military engagements underscored the strategic importance of Balana and the Kadugannawa Pass. The Portuguese, aiming to expand their control over the island, faced fierce resistance from the Kandyans. The Balana Fort served as a key defensive position in these conflicts. The rugged terrain and the fort's fortifications enabled the Kandyans to mount effective defenses against the better-armed Portuguese forces.

One of the notable battles in this region was the Battle of Randeniwela in 1630, where the Kandyans, led by King Senarat and Prince Maha Astana, defeated the Portuguese. The victory at Randeniwela was a testament to the effectiveness of the Kandyan defense strategies, which relied heavily on the natural fortifications provided by the Alagalla Mountain Range and the Balana Fort.

56.2.4 The British Era and the Kadugannawa Pass

The strategic importance of the Kadugannawa Pass persisted into the British colonial period. The British, recognizing the need for a more direct route to Kandy, constructed a new road through the pass in the 1820s. This project, led by Captain Dawson, involved piercing a rock at the Kadugannawa Pass to create what is now known as the Kadugannawa Tunnel. The tunnel and the new road significantly improved access to the Kandyan highlands, facilitating the British consolidation of power in the region.

The construction of the Colombo-Kandy road through the Kadugannawa Pass was a remarkable engineering feat of its time. The road's incline begins at 290 feet above sea level, passing through rugged terrain and reaching its peak near the Kadugannawa Dawson Tower at 1690 feet above sea level. This new route enhanced military and administrative control, boosting trade and communication between Colombo and Kandy.

56.3 Thumpana: A Battlefield of Portuguese Conflict in Sri Lanka

Thumpana, a historical site in Sri Lanka, is recognized for its strategic importance and the significant battles fought there during the Portuguese colonial period. Situated within the island's intricate topography, Thumpana served as a crucial battleground in the resistance efforts of the Sinhalese kingdoms against Portuguese encroachment. This region's historical relevance is underscored by its role in the broader narrative of Portuguese Ceylon and the fierce resistance mounted by the indigenous forces.

56.3.1 Strategic Location of Thumpana

Thumpana's geographical position contributed to its strategic importance. Located in the Central Province of Sri Lanka, Thumpana lies within a region characterized by rugged terrain, dense forests, and mountainous landscapes. These natural features provided a formidable defense mechanism for the Sinhalese forces against the better-armed and organized Portuguese troops. The area's challenging topography impeded the movement of large armies and offered numerous opportunities for ambushes and guerrilla tactics.

56.3.2 Portuguese Expansion and the Battle of Thumpana

The Portuguese arrived in Sri Lanka in the early 16th century to establish control over the island's lucrative spice trade and exert political dominance. They faced significant resistance from the local kingdoms, notably the Kingdom of Kandy, which sought to preserve its sovereignty. Thumpana became one of the many sites where this struggle for control unfolded.

One of the most notable engagements in Thumpana occurred during the conflicts that marked the Portuguese attempts to subjugate the Kandyan Kingdom. The battle at Thumpana was symbolic of the fierce resistance offered by the Kandyans. Utilizing their knowledge of the local terrain, the Kandyan forces, under the leadership of their kings and military strategists, launched effective defensive and offensive operations against the Portuguese.

56.3.3 The Dynamics of Warfare at Thumpana

The battles at Thumpana were characterized by the use of guerrilla tactics and strategic ambushes by the Sinhalese forces. The dense forests and uneven terrain provided ideal conditions for these tactics. The Kandyans, adept at navigating their homeland, utilized these advantages to launch surprise attacks on Portuguese encampments and supply lines. These tactics significantly hampered the Portuguese, who were more accustomed to conventional European warfare.

The Sinhalese forces also constructed temporary fortifications and utilized natural barriers to create defensive strongholds. These positions were often well-hidden and difficult to assault, forcing the Portuguese to engage in protracted and costly campaigns. The resilience and resourcefulness of the Kandyans at Thumpana exemplify the broader resistance efforts against colonial domination.

56.3.4 Historical Impact and Legacy

The battles fought at Thumpana were part of the more considerable resistance against Portuguese colonial ambitions in Sri Lanka. These conflicts significantly contributed to the eventual decline of Portuguese power on the island. The sustained resistance, exemplified by the engagements at Thumpana, demonstrated the determination of the Sinhalese kingdoms to preserve their autonomy and cultural identity. The legacy of Thumpana is integral to the history of Portuguese Ceylon. It stands as a testament to the strategic insight and resilience of the Sinhalese forces. Although less renowned than other battlegrounds, the site played a crucial role in the protracted struggle for control over Sri Lanka. The lessons learned from the warfare at Thumpana influenced subsequent resistance strategies against other colonial powers, including the Dutch and the British.

56.4 Deewalkanda: The Rocky Stronghold of Uduwara and the Battles of Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)

Deewalkanda, a prominent rock in Uduwara along the Kalu Ganga in Sri Lanka, holds significant historical importance due to the battles fought there, particularly during the resistance against Portuguese incursions. This natural fortress, situated strategically, served as a vital defensive position for local leaders such as Samarakoon, who played a crucial role in the resistance against colonial forces. The history of Deewalkanda is intertwined with the broader narrative of Sri Lankan resistance and the efforts to preserve the island's sovereignty and cultural heritage.

56.4.1 Strategic Importance of Deewalkanda

Deewalkanda, situated in the Uduwara region along the Kalu Ganga (Black River), is a remarkable natural formation that provides a formidable defensive stronghold. The rocky terrain and elevated position made it ideal for monitoring enemy movements and launching defensive operations. The Kalu Ganga, winding through the dense forests and rugged landscapes, added a layer of natural defense, complicating the logistics for any invading force.

56.4.2 The Battles of Deewalkanda and the Role of Samarakoon

During the Portuguese colonial period, Deewalkanda emerged as a critical site of resistance. Samarakoon, a prominent local leader, utilized the natural fortifications of Deewalkanda to mount a determined defense against Portuguese forces. The rock's strategic position allowed Samarakoon to effectively coordinate guerrilla tactics, ambushes, and defensive maneuvers, leveraging the challenging terrain to his advantage. One of the critical battles at Deewalkanda involved Samarakoon's forces launching surprise attacks on Portuguese troops attempting to penetrate deeper into the interior regions of Sri Lanka. The dense forest cover and the complex network of waterways in the area provided ample opportunities for ambushes. Samarakoon's intimate knowledge of the local geography allowed him to orchestrate these attacks precisely, significantly disrupting Portuguese supply lines and troop movements.

56.4.3 Guerrilla Warfare and Defensive Strategies

The warfare at Deewalkanda was characterized by guerrilla tactics, which proved highly effective against the conventional military strategies employed by the Portuguese. Samarakoon's forces utilized the natural barriers provided by the rock and the surrounding landscape to create hidden defensive positions. These positions were well-camouflaged and challenging for the Portuguese to locate and assault, allowing the defenders to inflict substantial casualties and retreat to safety when necessary.

The steep inclines and rocky outcrops of Deewalkanda made it arduous for the Portuguese to launch direct assaults. The defenders capitalized on this by setting up defensive lines that forced the attackers to navigate treacherous terrain, slowing their advance and making them vulnerable to attacks from elevated positions. This use of natural fortifications was a hallmark of the resistance strategies employed by Sri Lankan leaders like Samarakoon.

56.4.4 Historical Impact and Legacy

The resistance at Deewalkanda, led by Samarakoon, played a significant role in the broader struggle against Portuguese colonial ambitions in Sri Lanka. Local forces' ability to effectively utilize natural fortifications and employ guerrilla tactics demonstrated the resilience and strategic ingenuity of the Sinhalese leaders. The battles at Deewalkanda contributed to the eventual weakening of Portuguese control and catalyzed resistance against subsequent colonial powers.

The legacy of Deewalkanda is a testament to the enduring spirit of resistance among the Sri Lankan people. The site symbolizes the determination to defend sovereignty and cultural identity against foreign domination. The strategic use of natural fortifications at Deewalkanda influenced resistance strategies in other parts of the island, underscoring the importance of understanding and leveraging the local geography in military conflicts.

56.5 Conclusion

The historical sites of Balana, Thumpana, and Deewalkanda collectively underscore the strategic and historical significance of the Central Province of Sri Lanka in the broader narrative of resistance against Portuguese colonialism. Each location, with its unique geographical and strategic attributes, played a crucial role in the defense efforts of the Sinhalese kingdoms, highlighting their determination to resist foreign domination.

Balana and the Kadugannawa Pass exemplify the strategic understanding and resilience of the Kandyan Kingdom. The Balana Fort, with its formidable defenses and strategic location, served as a critical position in repelling Portuguese incursions. The challenging terrain of the Kadugannawa Pass provided a natural defense line and a vital gateway to the island's interior, underscoring its enduring significance into the British colonial period.

Thumpana's historical significance lies in its strategic location, and the fierce battles fought there, which are marked by the resourcefulness and resilience of the Indigenous forces. The engagements at Thumpana, characterized by guerrilla tactics and the use of natural defenses, reflect the determination of the Sinhalese kingdoms to preserve their sovereignty against foreign invaders.

Deewalkanda, with its strategic location and natural fortifications, stands as a testament to the effectiveness of guerrilla warfare and the resilience of local leaders such as Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, Samarakoon. The battles fought at this rocky stronghold highlight the broader struggle for sovereignty and cultural preservation, a powerful reminder of the Sinhalese leaders' strategic ingenuity and enduring spirit.

The legacies of Balana, Thumpana, and Deewalkanda form a vital chapter in Sri Lanka's history. They reflect the enduring spirit of resistance against colonial oppression and the strategic importance of these formidable battlegrounds. These sites remain constant symbols of the resistance efforts that shaped the course of Sri Lankan history, showcasing the resilience and strategic understanding of the island's defenders.

56.6 The Approach and Arrival of Portuguese until Establishment of the Portuguese Kingdom of Kotte

O. M. da Silva Cosme[1] is a professional lawyer and also historian. He researched for his book in Sri Lanka, Goa, and Lisbon. As mentioned above, Goa was the capital of the Portuguese Estado da India, of civil and ecclesiastical administration, trade, commerce, and social and cultural life. It remained Portuguese until it was annexed to India in 1961.

Fidalgo means Portuguese nobleman, similar to the Spanish term Hidalgo. In Sinhala, there used to be the word Pidalguwa, derived Marco Polo, the Venetian merchant and explorer (1254-1324), famous for his journey to Asia, including China, did not witness the wall during his visit. This was because a significant portion of the wall had not been constructed during his travels. Accompanied by his father, Niccolò Polo, and his uncle Maffeo Polo, Marco Polo's exploration extended beyond China, encompassing Malacca, Sri Lanka, and India. Their return journey included traversing the Arabian Sea to Hormuz and opting for a land route back to Venice. They traveled around Jaffna in North Sri Lanka before continuing their journey. from the Portuguese name[2]. By the way, 'Portugal' comes from 'Cale,' which was transformed into Portus Cale and became Portugal around 700.

When they arrived in Sri Lanka, it was evident that the Portuguese must have been eager to adopt place names such as Galle in the country's southwest because it sounded similar to what they knew.

Also, the port of Colombo must have sounded familiar as it is one of the European forms of Columbus. However, the similarity is a coincidence as the town existed already before the arrival of the Portuguese, explained further and also in Chapter 52.

As was mentioned above, the motivation to find India along a maritime route originated from a blockage of the land route to India. Indeed, from around 1450 onwards, European trade was in dire straits because the traditional land routes to Asia had become unsafe after the Mongol empire's breakup. Also, there were hostilities caused by the Ottomans, who made commerce with Asia along the Mediterranean Sea and the Middle East almost impossible.

Therefore, the West became obsessed with finding new sea routes to Asia. Henry of Portugal was perhaps the first to transform the desire into actual policy. Indeed, the Portuguese were the most experienced seafarers over actual rough seas, for instance, through trade along the Atlantic to France and the southern and northern Netherlands.

Still frustrated with the Moors, Henry wanted to spread Christianity south into Africa, again along the Atlantic coast. The Portuguese conquest of Ceuta in North Africa also increased the Portuguese drive in that direction.

The author visited Portugal in 1979, 1980, and 1981 and still has sweet memories of those journeys. Some pictures are shown in Figures 56.2 and 56.3.

56.6.1 Explorations and Navigation that Paved the Road to Sri Lanka

As da Silva states in his book, 'The voyages of discovery, make a wonderful saga of romance, deeds of daring, adventure, human suffering and endurance; tragedy and cruelty run throughout their history, making every page absorbing and interesting.' Yet, they may have had a great time upon arrival, such as in 56.35 on page 1104.

The Portuguese went to India step by step and discovered place after place.

The Portuguese knew very well where India, China, and Japan were located, thanks to Marco Polo (who had never seen the Great Wall in Figure 56.4), the Venetians, and the Arabs. Still, they searched a route around Africa to circumvent the monopoly of the Arabs and Venetians.

It was in 1418 that the island of Porto Santo was visited, followed by Madeira in 1419. The Portuguese visited the Azores between 1427 and 1431.

Note that Flemish persons were also involved in the conquest of the Azores. Indeed, there was a secure commerce connection between Flanders and Portugal and between Flanders and Spain.

Cape Bojador down the African coast was visited in 1434, and Rio de Oro in 1436. In 1437, an unsuccessful attempt to capture Tanger was made in Figure 56.5. In 1439 the Azores were colonised. Note that the Azores were not habited before the Portuguese arrival. From 1445 onward, the Azores exported sugar.

The Portuguese could sail deeper down the African coast thanks to lighter ships such as the caravel with 2 or 3 masts and lateen sails, sometimes square-rigged. A lateen, also called a Latin rig, is a triangular sail mounted at an angle on the mast. It existed for centuries in the Mediterranean, but it had not been considered before for use on ocean ships. In contrast to Caracks, which had mainly rectangular sails, Caravels, as in Figure 56.6, were equipped primarily with lateen sails, were minor, and were better capable of tacking against the wind.

Interestingly, the Caravels were very popular, and they were also used. An armada consisted of different ships, probably because each had its military function, such as Caracks being the floating fortresses and Caravels being very maneuverable, even against the wind. Military ships were quickly converted to commercial ones, and vice versa, or sometimes both functions were combined simultaneously.

1443, the Portuguese reached the Bay of Arguin; in 1444, they reached the Cape Verde Islands. Dinas Dias reached the mouth of the Senegal River in 1445. In 1445 they reached the Gambia, and in 1456 they reached the Cape Verde Islands.

Figure 56.16: Schematic of the sea routes to Asia and America. The Green arrows indicate the road back and forth from Lisbon or Cadiz to Cuba. The blue arrows show the path to India, and the yellow ones show the route from India. In the East of Africa, sailing around Madagascar or remaining close to the coast was an option. The Iberians discovered these routes, which the VOC, the British Empire, and the French later exploited. The departure was in Cape Verde's direction from Iberia, while the return was by the Azores. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

The author visited those areas in 1981, in Figure 56.7. The Portuguese hoped to find a new route to India from that moment onwards because Africa's coastline turned eastwards. As we know, they would later be disappointed when they discovered that the coast turned South again further, but they did not give up and would continue, step by step, to sail more deeply to the South of Africa and would then finally discover that they were floating around the continent towards India.

In 1458, military expeditions began under King Alfonso V, who must have dreamed of conquering new areas overseas when watching the Portuguese coast as in Figure 56.8.

Indeed, in 1458, the first such expedition was sent to Morocco.

By 1460, when King Henry died, Africa's coast had been reached until Sierra Leone. In 1471, Tanger and Arzila were conquered. Between 1481 and 1482, a fortress was constructed at Elmina in the Gulf of Guinea, which served as a trading post, called Sao Jorge da Mina.

With their misinformed history classes at school, Belgians think of Livingston when considering the Congo River.

However, it was Diogo Cam who, in 1482, discovered the mouth of the Congo. The same person reached Cape Cross in 1486. By Pero da Covilha in 1487, the Portuguese found that India could be reached through a land route via Egypt to the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. It gave them hope that it must have been possible to travel around Africa, which motivated them to sail further South to find the continent's southernmost tip.

In 1488, Bartolomeu Dias, in Figure 56.8, rounded the southern end of Africa and sailed into the Indian Ocean. He called the southern tip the 'Cape of Storms,' later called the 'Cape of Good Hope.'

Indeed, a pillar was found in 1938 in False Island, about 30 miles from the Great Fish River, and proved that the Portuguese were there in the year known to historians.

In 1477, Christopher Columbus, whose tomb is seen in Figure 56.9, settled in Lisbon, the center of cosmography and astronomy. Later, he went to Madeira and also Sao Jorge da Mina. Being experienced as a sailor, he wanted to sail west to China (then called Cathay). He believed, or at least argued, that Japan (then called Cipango) was just 25000 nautical miles west of the islands of the Canaries in the Atlantic.

We should also note that Columbus's brother was a cartographer in Lisbon, and Columbus' wife belonged to one of Portugal's most prominent families, Perestrello e Moniz. Nevertheless, Columbus needed help convincing the Portuguese King John II to financially support his efforts to find Asia in the West. Indeed, the Portuguese were focused on their search to go around Africa to India.

Finally, Columbus was supported by Ferdinand and Isabella from Spain. After discovering Cuba, Columbus believed that he had found Ptolemy's Golden Chersonese (i.e., the Malay Peninsula) and passed Cipango.

In the framework of the many stories about the actual identity of Christopher Columbus, we must emphasize here that Christopher Columbus' wife was the daughter of a Portuguese nobleman of Lombardian descent. This is the only indisputable link with Genua. He either married her because of this Genoese link, or he married her because her father was a Portuguese nobleman. Both options make sense.[3]

The discovery of the New World by Christopher Columbus on behalf of Castile caused a dispute between the Spanish and the Portuguese. According to a treaty between both, Castile was not supposed to interfere with the Atlantic's Portuguese activities. Pope Alexander V, a Spaniard, issued bulls to protect both countries' interests.

This was done in 1493 by a line 345 miles beyond the Azores and the Cape Verde Islands. The idea was simple. Anything West of this line would be Spanish. Everything east would be Portuguese. The Portuguese were more experienced than the Spanish and knew that if they wanted to go around Africa, they would have to use the wind South of the equator, bringing them further West

Figure 56.17: In November 1997, the author went on a catamaran a few miles from Sri Lanka near Kalutara. The sea was calm, as Figure 56.18 explained. When the monsoon causes north-western winds, the sea is usually very rough, so swimming or navigating in June and July is perilous. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

[3] The only thing that does not make sense is that the Genoese theory of the birth of Columbus states that he was the son of a wool weaver, a middle-class man. Even though documents show that there was such a wool weaver in Genua who had a son, Christopher, whose family name was Columbus (all in the Ligurian format), it should not be used as conclusive evidence that he was born in Genua. A name is certainly not unique. For this reason, we should not ab initio reject the Catalan claim of Columbus's identity and the disguise of his true identity caused by the competition between the Crowns of Castile and Aragon. Upon his first return from America, we should remember that Columbus arrived in Barcelona. There is also a Portuguese claim that we should keep in mind. The fact is that most historians are convinced, based on documentation, that Columbus was, indeed, Genoese. The point that many people still doubt is beneficial for supporting further investigations, such as DNA analysis. The reader may also check Chapter 8.6

Figure 56.18: Wind patterns of the Monsoon. Yellow is summer, and blue is Winter. For instance, the West Coast of Sri Lanka has a very calm sea in Winter because the water is not disturbed by the wind, as it's tranquil in the shadow of the island for wind coming from the Northeast. In Summer, however, the sea is rough, and there are also rains coming from the Arabian Sea. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

In the middle is a map produced in 1702 by Edmund Halley, and it shows the deviations of the magnetic lines on the Atlantic Ocean. The author has sweet memories of the stamp on the left. In 1986, Sri Lanka issued stamps of Halley and his comet. Edmund Halley had discovered that several reported comets were the same re-appearing one. The one named after him is visible from Earth every 75 years. The last time was in March 1986; we expect it again around 2061. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

Figure 56.20: The author saw the Southern Cross for the first time during his visit to Melbourne in, Australia in March 2003. The author promised his eldest son that he would snap pictures of kangaroos in Australia and take a one-day tour just before the beginning of his congress. On that tour, there was an American couple with their daughter. The father had a good conversation with the author about Australia. At some point, the father advised his daughter about a particular problem. He urged his daughter to 'always keep walking, no matter what.' The author has always remembered these words and keeps them close to the heart. No matter your problem, 'keep walking' is still the best solution, even if you only take small steps at a time. During that tour, the blue mountains were visible in the distance, named after their color caused by diffraction and Lord Rayleigh's first explanation. The latter is John William Strutt (1842-1919), who is considered the father of acoustics, although he also worked in optics. On Friday, while having a very high fever and staring at the high walls and ceiling from his bed, the author heard the Islamic prayers in the nearby mosque and thought he had been kidnapped somewhere in Lebanon. Mr Gaffoor was an intelligent person who taught the author several crucial attitudes to dealing with fellow humans, particularly Sri Lankans. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

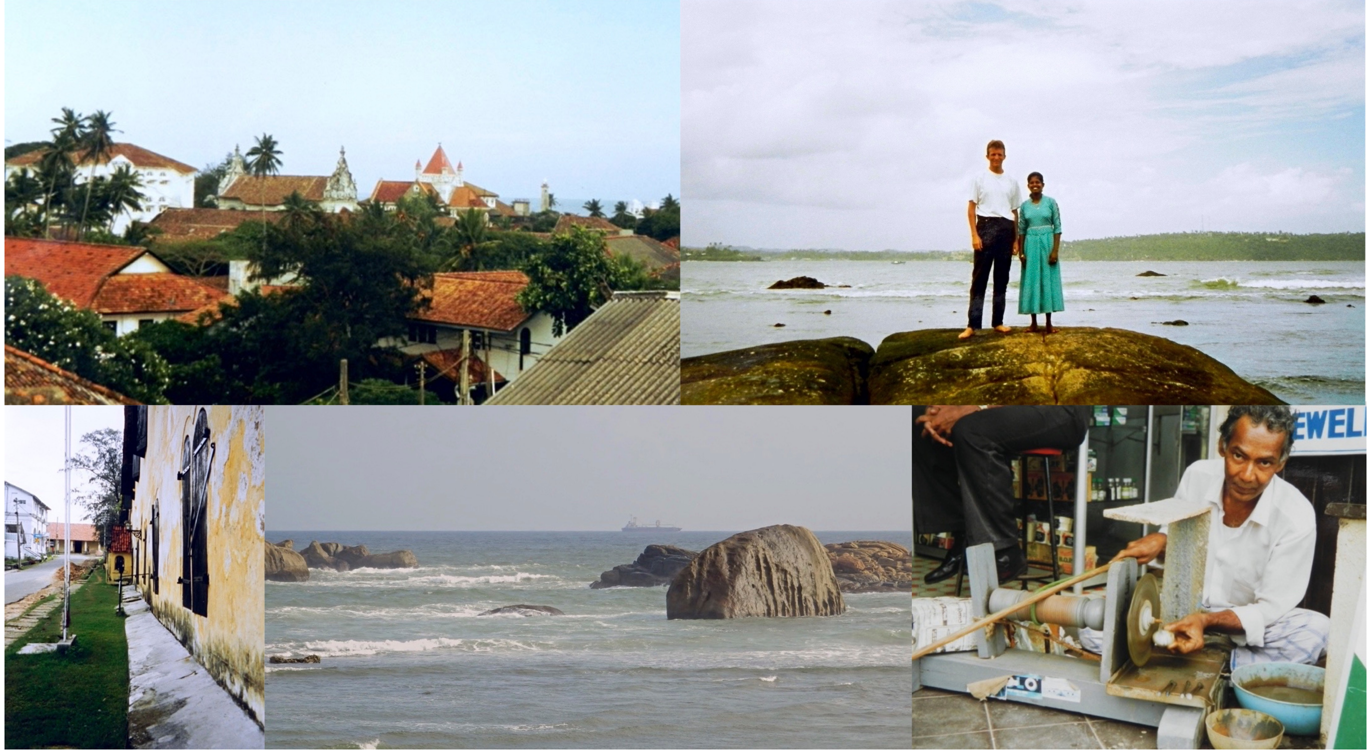

Figure 56.26: *In this compilation of 1997 images, we view the town of Galle from within. Muslims mainly inhabit the city, but it has been a Portuguese fortress, followed by the VOC's occupation. We can also observe the Portuguese 'feitoria,' used by the VOC at the fortress. The VOC probably made enlargements, possibly the British, too. In 1997 Galle, there were still traditional gem cutters and polishers, although modern technology was also available. Sri Lanka is very famous for its Ceylon Blue Saphire, Rubis de Ceylan and other gems. The country is also one of the major import countries for fake gems. Therefore, one must be extremely cautious when buying gems in Sri Lanka and become an expert before doing so. One can find the real ones, but the fake ones, too. Galle's harbor is also seen from the town's shore. Then, a view from Galle in 2014 is presented. Ships still pass from Singapore, India, and China to the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, just as they did during the Portuguese and VOC periods. The 'Point de Galle' was a busy area for ships between Malacca and Goa. Interestingly, blue whales do not reside far from the coast of Galle. Their existence was known around a decade ago. than this theoretical line. Therefore, the line hampered future Portuguese explorations.

For this reason, King Joao of Portugal forced a new treaty with the Spanish. Indeed, the Treaty of Tordesillas of 1494 moved the vertical line further West, 1300 miles West of Cape Verde's islands.

The new line allowed the Portuguese to sail further West when trying to circumvent Africa. During one of such attempts, Cabral discovered Brazil and claimed it virtually as Portuguese territory as it was found East of the line of Tordesillas.

There was another bull, in 1455, by Pope Nicolas V, which reserved African discoveries to the Portuguese.

Although the Spanish found the Americas through Columbus's voyages, Vasco da Gama, shown in Figure 56.10, made the ultimate voyage from Portugal around Africa to India.

From an economic perspective, this was the most meaningful event and eclipsed the Spanish then. Da Gama's tombs are also shown in Figure 56.10.

The author married in Sri Lanka, on the Indian Sub-Continent, 500 years minus one month after the beginning of the first voyage of Vasco da Gama to India. His foster father, Pierre Vangheluwe, who had shown him, Sri Lanka, from 1985-1988, died on July 8, 1991, which is, to the day, exactly 494 years after Vasco da Gama departed to India, from Lisboa, along with the beautiful Portuguese coast in Figure 56.11. The Da Gama family was thriving in Goa, as seen in Figure 56.12.

The ships of Vasco da Gama reached Calicut, in Figure 56.13, in the Spring of 1498. He returned successfully to Lisbon in the fall of 1499, 500 years before the author's first child's birth.

Note that it was Amerigo Vespucci, an Italian merchant, who discovered the mainland and who figured out that the newly discovered islands by Columbus belonged not to Asia but a new continent, hence the name of the new continent given by the German geographer Waldseemuller in 1507 who named the continent America.

Later, other European countries, such as England, France, and the Northern Netherlands, played a role in the discoveries and claimed their parts. Belgium played a separate role in the Austrian Netherlands or Austrian Belgium era because they were effectively part of Spain.

They were involved in the global sea routes in Spain and Portugal and had their separate task of distributing goods imported through Cadiz or Lisbon to the rest of Northern Europe. We should also remember Venice, which continued to play an essential role in trade in the Mediterranean.

However, the big star around 1500 was Portugal, which discovered the new sea route to India.

The reign of Manoel the Fortunate[4] transformed Portugal from a discovering nation to a colonizing or occupational country and initiated a military expansion.

Indeed, the Portuguese did not necessarily arrive in a paradise everywhere and met resistance, primarily from Muslim merchants who feared their monopoly was in danger.

For instance, the ruler (i.e., the Zamorin) of Calicut was forced by the Muslims and Christian-Syrian merchants to be hostile towards the Portuguese newcomers and to make Vasco da Gama return home. It is known that da Gama had to fight his way out.

The difficulties encountered and overcome by the Portuguese in that era are tremendous and still baffle historians. Anyone who appreciates Portuguese adventures should visit the Tagus River and the Belem Tower. Some impressions are shown in Figure 56.14.

Figure 56.33: Gems near Uduwara, 1985. Sri Lanka is very well known for its Ceylonese Blue sapphire. Blue sapphire forms in granitic pegmatites during the final stage of a magma's crystallization and are corundum syenites, a crystalline form of aluminum oxide typically containing traces of elements such as iron, vanadium, magnesium, chromium, and titanium. Its light blue color generally shows an internal grain structure, also called defects. An artificial blue sapphire looks naturally pure and is often much darker than the Ceylonese blue sapphire. Sometimes, sapphires undergo heat treatment to make them more perfect, but they are more difficult to distinguish from fake ones. One must, indeed, be very cautious. A Ceylon sapphire is most valuable when untreated. An example is the Stuart Sapphire, a 3.8 cm long and 2.5 cm wide stone, in Queen Victoria's State Crown. The massive blue Saphire comes from Sri Lanka but was not taken by the British, unlike some stories on the island. Sri Lanka was the primary origin of gems in the classical period and can be found, for instance, in Etruscan jewelry. There was a massive trade of gems from the island all over the Mediterranean. The Stuart Saphire dates to 1214 and is a 104-carat Ceylonese blue sapphire. The stone belonged to Charles II and was taken by James VII when he fled to France in 1688. After a long journey, it was purchased by George III in 1807 and returned from Italy to the United Kingdom. It was finally placed on the Imperial State Crown of HM Queen Victoria, perhaps because she knew it was Ceylonese, the jewel on her crown. The gem remains on HM Queen Elizabeth II's Imperial State Crown, made in 1937. Courtesy of the Jewel House, Tower of London.

In March 1500, Pedro Alvares Cabral, in Figure 56.15, was dispatched by Manoel the Fortunate to India. He went with 13 ships to impress the Indian rulers. When he used the winds to circumvent Africa, as advised by Vasco da Gama, he discovered Brazil during his voyage. The Portuguese were unaware they had found a southern part of America and thought it was an island. They called the island Terra da Santa Cruz. After the discovery, Pedro Alvares Cabra sent one ship back to Portugal to inform the King while the others continued their voyage toward India.

Four boats with all men on board during that voyage, including the famous Bartolomeo Diaz, disappeared.

Cabral, perhaps somewhat desperate after the losses and further motivated after the discovery of Brazil, arrived in Calicut and released immense cannon fire to impress the Indians. The display was successful as he could force a treaty between the ruler of Calicut and the Portuguese.

A Portuguese settlement was established, and 54 men stayed behind to man the accommodation. They would, however, soon all be killed by the Indians.

Cabral learned his lesson and decided to use more force from now on. Therefore, he bombarded Calicut to avenge his inmates' deaths, which inevitably impressed the raja of Cochin, a dependency of Calicut, as he turned out friendlier towards Cabral and allowed the Portuguese to install the first European settlement in India successfully at Cochin.

The Portuguese could then sail away.

In 1500, Diogo Dias discovered Madagascar. Joao da Nova reached Cochin in 1501, and Ascension Island was located in 1501 while St Helena in 1502.

At Cochin, Joao da Nova established a trading post at Cannanore, a center for trade in Ginger, Pepper and Timberwood.

In 1502, Vasco da Gama went to India with 20 ships to punish the Zamorin of Calicut as a final retaliation for the killings done by the Indians 2 years before. On the way to India, da Gama also formed political relations with rulers along the African coast, such as modern-day Tanzania, Sofala, and Mozambique. He, too, overwhelmed the Muslim merchants in the Indian Ocean with immense force.

Indeed, the Portuguese had reached a point of no return in conquering the world and could no longer allow competitors to stop their expansion. For instance, da Gama destroyed a Muslim fleet of 28 vessels, and he also heavily bombarded Calicut.

As a result, he forced a peace treaty with the local ruler in December 1503, after which he could return to Portugal as a real victor, carried by 13 vessels filled with goods from India.

In 1503, Alfonso de Albuquerque entered the arena. Indeed, he was despatched to India, and it was his task to build the first Portuguese fortress in Cochin. Thanks to this fortress, Pachecho Pereira could withstand 1504 attacks from the armies of the Zamorin of Calicut.

Besides the fort at Cochin, Albuquerque also established a trading post at Quilon before returning to Portugal in July 1504. His successes allowed him to become one of the policymakers of King Manoel.

For the reader unfamiliar with the wind patterns and the connected trade routes, we shall make a summary guided by Figure 56.16. The sun is the driving force of the wind in our atmosphere because its heat increases the humidity or raises air because it becomes less dense, or both. The Earth's gravity ensures that the layer of air covering our planet tends to stick as closely as possible to it so that a volume increase or decrease due to heating or cooling equally causes air displacements. Air that lifts tends to decrease the pressure underneath and sucks in air from neighboring regions, while air that comes down causes the opposite. During such lift, humidity may transform to rain due to temperature decrease, while the remaining air becomes dryer. The combination of the effects causes the conception of convection cells. Three classes of convection cells exist Polar cells near the North and South poles, Mid-Latitude cells between roughly 60 and 30 degrees North, and between 60 and 30 degrees South. Hadley cells are caused by a strong lift of air on the equator (causing equatorial rains) and a downward motion about 30 degrees North or South from the equator.

The constant air movement is influenced by night and day patterns and seasons determined by the sun's height. It occurs at every altitude in the atmosphere. Aeroplane pilots are very interested in airflow in higher regions of the atmosphere, while naval captains search for the most efficient winds above water.

In addition to the effects caused by the sun, there are also effects caused by oceanic water streams that may stabilize the atmosphere, cool it, or heat it. Furthermore, such flows may or may not be helpful for sailing boats to gain speed. Of crucial importance for the sea voyage routes to the Americas and Asia is the effect caused by the rotation of the Earth.

This force is now called 'Coriolis Force', but few people truly understood it during the Iberians' great explorations. However, thanks to studies initiated by Henry the Navigator and the numerous Iberian explorers, mainly the Portuguese, wind patterns were mapped and exploited.

Indeed, the wind rotates clockwise or counterclockwise thanks to the Coriolis Force, making voyages very convenient if appropriately used. If not used properly, a ship may be stuck and disappear or waste too much time. In general, winds in the northern hemisphere turn clockwise, while winds in the southern hemisphere turn counterclockwise.

Nowadays, some aspects of what is labeled as 'Coriolis Force' were studied in the framework of cannonballs' long-distance firing. Indeed, when a cannonball leaves its cannon, it has a velocity in the barrel's direction and another that is determined by the Earth's spinning. When the ball increases in height, its trajectory is influenced by its initial ground velocity and its initial speed regarding the barrel. It is accelerated by the expanding hot air ignited by black powder.

The trajectory is equally influenced by the direction in which the ball is fired. If, for instance, the cannonball is shot in the Northern hemisphere to the North, then it will become slightly ahead in speed compared to the ground.

Proper observation of these effects is fundamental to aiming correctly and hitting a target. However, similar phenomena influence the wind's direction as air is lifted from the Earth and then blows North or South. Air transportation's long duration and path transform a rectilinear way into a spiral one, causing clouds and wind to rotate clockwise in the Northern hemisphere and counterclockwise in the Southern.

The observation of the Coriolis force, without complete understanding, appeared in the 17th century, for instance, in the work of Giovanni Battista Riccioli and Francesco Maria Grimaldi[5], or by Claude François Milliet Dechales, in his work 'Cursus seu Mundus Mathematicus', published in 1674. Christopher M. Graney also describes an overview of this history[6].

1749 Euler derived the proper mathematical formula to describe the Coriolis acceleration. Pierre Simon Laplace later properly described the effect in 1778 in his tidal equations. In 1835, Gaspard Gustave Coriolis published a paper on energy conservation principles applied to spinning wheels in machines. In his work, Gaspard Gustave Coriolis separately studied forces different from the centrifugal force due to rotation. Although he named them 'compound centrifugal force,' all other scientists would refer to it as 'Coriolis Force.'

William Ferrel did the first proper scientific study connecting the wind direction with the Coriolis force 1856. A complete theory regarding pressure gradients followed early in the 20th century. Nowadays, the notion of 'isobars' on a weather map is crucial to explaining the weather.

It's crucial to observe wind blowing from West to East, in the North and the South near the poles, to understand the routes to navigate the oceans. These winds are known as 'the westerlies' and were well-known before the exploration era and made it very hard for North Europeans to cross the sea without first sailing to Iberia's tip. Indeed, winds were blowing South and West from Iberia, allowing a proper departure. These winds and others that differed from the Westerlies were called the 'Trade Winds.'

Indeed, only those who understood the trade winds knew how to reach Asia and the Americas. Etymologically, the word 'trade' originally meant 'path' in old English.

Sometimes, the trade winds near the equator, continually blowing from East to West, are also referred to as Easterlies. The Portuguese used to call these winds the Volta do mar or the 'turn of the sea.'

This expression originates from the Portuguese's early navigation, who could not reach the Azores straight from Portugal but had to follow the wind South and the winds blowing from East to West to arrive in the Southwest of the Azores before they could reach the archipelago.

So, they had to make this tour, or this 'turn of the sea,' i.e., the volta do mar. It also provided them with a safe return from the Azores to Portugal. Similar turns exist in the Pacific and may have caused Asians to be blown, in sailing boats, to North America long before recorded history. Perhaps this is how the Native Americans arrived from Asia.

Note also that the Westerlies south of Africa allow sailors to reach Australia easily and is how the first explorers[7] discovered Australia.

In Asia, sailers also established trade routes thanks to the wind. The most important one passed along Sri Lanka near Colombo and Galle. It's interesting to get on a boat in Sri Lanka and leave the coast, as the author did in a Catamaran in 1997 in Figure 56.17, to receive an impression of this naval highway.

The Arabs had discovered the prevailing winds, shown in Figure 56.18, to reach Indonesia from the Arabian peninsula and governed sea trade along this route until the Portuguese' appearance. In that area, it is of vital importance to understand the Monsoon. The Monsoon determines when a ship should sail towards its destination. This knowledge is essential for traders and the military, who must realize these constraints for their purposes or to predict an enemy's passage.

The Monsoon has two branches, i.e., the Arabian Sea and the Bay of Bengal. In summer, the Monsoon blows air in a clockwise rotation, and in Winter, in a counterclockwise direction. To reach Goa, for instance, from the East African coast, one must wait until Summer. To sail back from Goa to Africa, one must wait until Winter.

The cause of the Monsoon is very complex and has yet to be fully understood. However, observing the directions in the different seasons was crucial for sailors. It also allows us to understand the importance of Goa. Indeed, vessels from the Arabian peninsula would always reach Goa before traveling South and East towards Indonesia. Having control of Goa was equal to controlling this trade route.

[7] The Portuguese traditionally believe that they have been the ones who discovered Australia but kept it secret.

Sailing around South Africa, in either direction, was a significant challenge and caused many ships to disappear. The windows of opportunity were usually small, and there was also a water stream to be taken into account in addition to the wind. For instance, there is an ocean stream (' the Agulhas current') from North East to South West along the East coast of South Africa. So, when a ship returned from India, it was beneficial to pass Africa close to the South's beach, except if the wind was not helpful. At Cape Town, for instance, on the west-side tip of Africa, the wind blows mainly from the North in summer and from the South in Winter. Furthermore, the sea bottom highly influences the coastal water and can cause 'rogue waves' near the shore, which can instantaneously sink a ship. Rogue waves are suddenly appearing surface waves, also known as 'killer waves' or 'monster waves.' Also, currents from the Indian Ocean meet the ones from the Atlantic, and those meeting points can be very rough and may again sink ships. Therefore, ships should pass sufficiently far from the coast.

Modern reports indicate that the Agulhas current, unfortunately, runs predominantly in the opposite direction of the prevailing winds. On average, this current flows from Northeast to Southwest along the South African coast and then turns to the East, South of Africa.

Hence, if only this current were exploited, a ship would prefer to sail east, south of Africa, and west along the coast. The problems mean that a captain must gamble between relying primarily on the water current or the wind. Sometimes, both act in the same direction and then a passage is prosperous in terms of time and risk.

Indeed, sailing around Africa has always been hazardous and is the main reason why, on average, at least half of the sailing boats during the Portuguese and VOC era never returned home.

Knowledge of which path to follow is crucial, but it is only possible if one knows one's current location on the planet. The Portuguese could determine the latitude, but one had to wait until the 18th century for the longitude.

Longitude offers distance, in degrees, in the east-west direction of Earth, while latitude gives distance, in degrees, measured from the equator. The two names are easily remembered if we know that longitude refers to the length direction of the Mediterranean along which the antique world was organized. On the other hand, latitude refers to a tool used to measure it, namely a rod, stick, or lat in Dutch (from latus in Latin). Measuring the latitude in the Northern Hemisphere is an easy task. Indeed, one has to calculate the Polaris angle at night, i.e., the north star and the horizon. The pitch is equal to that of the position measured from the equator.

One can use a sextant or astrolabe, or a similar device that gives the degrees, or something more primitive and ancient can be used, such as a kamal.

It consists of a rectangular plank with a rope attached and placed between the teeth. The plank is moved away from the eye towards the horizon until the north star is located at the upper side of the plank and the horizon at the lower. The rod measures the distance from the plank to the face. Exact numbers were unnecessary because the latitude of harbors and other locations was marked by knots in the rope. If the distance matched a not, the sailor knew that he was at the adequate latitude and just had to sail east or west to reach his destination. Nomads used a similar device to find the temple of Abraham (Mekka) in the desert on the Arabian Peninsula.

The affected latitude would later be used to determine the golden ratio, which is still used as a ratio of perfect beauty and geometric harmony in architecture. A tool based on the same principle was the 'cross-staff,' essentially a rod (lat) with a tiny stick perpendicularly attached to it, which could glide along the rod. The sailor could aim at the north star and slide the post until it matched the horizon or vice versa. The length along the rod was again a measure related to the latitude. During the day, the Polaris was not visible, so one had to use the sun. However, our nearest star is moving along the visible sky; consequently, one usually picks the highest position at noon to make a measurement. Because the height also depends on the date on the calendar, one had to compare tables to relate the date to the son's height and compare it with the measured one to determine the latitude.

In the southern hemisphere, the sun is used similarly. However, the night is a problem in the southern hemisphere because there is no equivalent in the South of the Polaris, and the latter is not visible in the sky.

Therefore, a sophisticated determination of the south pole is necessary based on the observable constellations, such as the southern cross, as mentioned in Figure 56.20.

Very often, when the weather was cloudy, it was difficult to maintain course between measurements because no reference marks were visible. On land, one can use two sticks to use the stars and their relative motion caused by the Earth's rotation to find out which is the North-South or East-West direction; on a stamping and rolling ship, this is impossible.

The compass, invented by the Chinese, played a vital role in solving this problem. Indeed, the compass needle is always aligned with the Earth's magnetic field, which averages point North. Even if there is a deviation between the geographic North and the magnetic line, it provides the sailor with a reference to maintain his course.

Edmund Halley produced a map, in Figure 56.19 with the Earth's magnetic lines to allow a sailor to adjust the North of his compass with an offset so that he could accurately determine the geographic north pole without celestial observations.

There is also a comet named after Halley. The author came into contact with astronomy for the first time in 1986, thanks to Halley's comet. The comet was not a very big fuss in Belgium; however, it was in Sri Lanka. Thanks to philately, the author had an excellent knowledge of geography, politics, foreign languages, and currencies. At the same time, this hobby introduced him to astronomy because Sri Lanka issued a series of stamps about Halley and the comet named after him, as in Figure 56.19.

Observing the night sky, however, was not new to the author. Indeed, in Sri Lanka, which he visited for the first time in 1985, the stars and planets were visible and fascinated him. In 1986, everyone in Sri Lanka appeared to know a lot about the sky because of the appearance of Halley's comet that year and probably because it had appeared frequently in the news and classes at school. Hence, the visit in 1986 was very educational and caused a fascination that ultimately resulted in a master's degree in astrophysics in 2000.

Edmund Halley (1656-1742), shown in Figure 56.19, suggested using the measured variations by sailors to determine the longitude. This technique was helpful but not ideal because of a lack of accuracy.

Indeed, determining the longitude was not possible until the invention of a ship-worthy clock. Imagine that it takes 24 hours for the Earth to rotate around its axis (approximately), then the son appears to move 15 degrees per hour along the sky. By comparing the time at the highest point, at noon, with the time at a reference point on the planet (Greenwich), it's possible to rapidly know how many degrees one is West or East from that reference and, therefore, find the longitude.

Making such a clock was an enormous challenge and was first solved by John Harrison (1693-1776), shown in Figure 56.21, in the 1740s.

He designed his clock with metals attached, with opposite temperature-related characteristics to account for temperature fluctuations and provide stability. He also managed to use springs rather than a traditional pendulum.

His first clock could have been better and was further refined in subsequent versions until he reached perfection so that the error was only a few seconds per day, even at rough sea.

Before that, other researchers tried to find clocks in the night sky. One can indeed observe that moons are circling Jupiter. They act as clocks that can help, if correctly followed, to determine the reference time. However, seeing Jupiter's moons is not easy; it is not at sea and impossible in cloudy weather. Furthermore, Jupiter is not always only sometimes. It depends on the planet's orbit compared to Earth's and its spin.

56.6.2 The Blood-Relatives of de Silva who became involved in the Quest for India and Sri Lanka

The de Silva family became involved in 1505 through their blood relative Francisco de Almeida.

Indeed, in 1505, King Manoel despatched Francisco de Almeida to India to enforce Portuguese presence at key locations along the route from Portugal to India. The purpose was to block as many Arabs in the Indian Ocean as possible.

He strengthened, for instance, the outpost of Kilwa and bombarded Mombasa in modern Kenya. In India, he allied with the Raja of Cochin against the Zamorin of Calicut. The beautiful island of Sri Lanka would be discovered by Lorenzo de Albuquerque, Francisco's son, who also found the Maldives.

In 1506, Alfonso de Albuquerque left Portugal in April to build a fortress along the East African coast on the island of Socotra to block the Red Sea and stop the Arabs from entering the Indian Ocean.

On this voyage, Tristan de Cunha was with Albuquerque, discovered the island named after him, and explored Madagascar.

By August 1507, Albuquerque seized the Gulf of Oman and established Persian trade with Europe. The operation cannot be regarded as a success because the Portuguese needed to build a fortress at Ormuz but guarded the coastline with ships. Muscat would be taken in 1515, however.

Meanwhile, Francisco de Almeida defeated a Calicut fleet in India. However, his son, Lourenço, would be beaten and killed by an Egyptian fleet near Chaul, south of Bombay, in 1508. Francisco de Almeida was shocked by his son's death.

When Albuquerque wanted to take over India's affairs after arriving in Cochin in December 1508, Francisco refused and wanted to wait until he had had a chance to avenge his son's death. Indeed, de Almeida won over the combined Egyptian and Calicut fleets in 1509 near the island of Diu. This victory assured Portuguese control of the sea route between Portugal and India.

Francisco de Almeida would die in weird circumstances. He was murdered by Hottentot tribe members at Table Bay (Cape Town) in March 1510 while trying to enter his ship to return to Portugal. One goal that de Almeida had yet to achieve was the Malacca seizure. However, he had secured the sea route towards Malacca during his reign, which was an achievement that resulted in enormous implications later on.

While Francisco de Almeida had been Viceroy of India, he favored a fortification at Colombo in Sri Lanka, which could become the center of Government for the Portuguese territories on the island. Indeed, Colombo had a water supply and a harbor, which were both essential conditions.

Also, Colombo was located on the route to Malacca and was, therefore, of strategic importance. However, the plans could not be carried out because of his activities in India.

Nevertheless, after his death, Albuquerque was the next Viceroy and had to make essential choices on where the seat of Government would be located. Colombo was indeed an option, and so was Cochin, but he finally chose Goa.

It was indeed so that the winds pushed Portuguese ships more efficiently, and first, to the coast of Goa, and they typically had to pass the southern Indian coast to reach Colombo.

Therefore, Colombo could only be sufficiently safeguarded if the Portuguese ruled South-East India's coast rather than vice versa. It was, hence, more natural and safer to choose Goa rather than Colombo.

At that time, Goa was not yet in the hands of the Portuguese but was ruled by Muslim princes. Alfonso de Albuquerque successfully seized Goa in March of 1510 and was soon expelled from Goa but regained it in November. He then took Goa to the seat of Government.

Alfonso de Albuquerque established a policy of mixed marriages between Portuguese men and local Indian women. There were several reasons for this policy.

First, Portugal needed more inhabitants to expand the world considerably. Second, in the first decades, the Portuguese who sailed to India were men, not women. To broaden the Portuguese presence, it appeared only natural to marry local women and have many children. These children would then be loyal to Portugal and the outpost on which they were born and raised. The Portuguese believed this would be the best guarantee of establishing a global Portuguese empire.

Furthermore, the mixed marriages would also create sacred bonds between Portuguese and local Indians and would best guarantee long-lasting peace. Perhaps Albuquerque was inspired by the Greek Alexandre the Great, who imposed this policy upon his men.

56.6.3 The Arrival of the de Silva Family in Goa

All these events took place before the arrival of the de Silva family in India, although their relatives, through de Almeida, had already been involved. Indeed, Juan Carvalho de Silva, son of Maria de Silva, would arrive in Goa, shown in Figure 56.22, probably with Vasco da Gama in 1524.

Although da Gama died of Malaria at Cochin at the end of 1524, he established a new order in India. He received the title of Viceroy, which had yet to be given since Francisco de Almeida. Juan de Silva's son, Antonio, of an Indian mother, would become involved in the Portuguese activities in Sri Lanka, as explained further.

To return to Francisco de Almeida, he received the title of Viceroy of India in July of 1511, after his successful seizure of Malacca, which turned the center of the Molukkes Portuguese and granted Portuguese access to spices and many other goods from the Far East. De Almeida set up trading posts at Malacca. During his voyage, Goa had been besieged. Still, de Almeida could relieve Goa in 1512 on his return from Malacca and, therefore, established considerable control over the total trade of goods in the Indian Ocean.

Conquering Malacca demanded great respect from the Hindu rulers who recognized Portuguese presence from then onwards. Later, he would not successfully capture Aden, and, therefore, renewed economic competition grew between the Portuguese route and the land route from the east through Egypt into the Mediterranean Sea. The competition also continued after the Ottomans conquered Egypt in 1517.

However, Albuquerque would always continue competing for the abovementioned route and tried to establish a third route through Persia, so, in 1515, he conquered Ormuz and Muscat in the Persian Gulf with 26 ships.

Albuquerque died a depressed man, however, when, while being sick on his way back to Goa, he had heard that Goa's governance had been given to his enemy, Lopo Soares de Albergaria. Albuquerque died aboard the ship in December 1515, close to Goa. Even after five centuries, Alfonso de Albuquerque still received enormous respect and is considered the best and most crucial ruler Asia has ever had by some. Together with de Almeida, he entered history as one of the most extraordinary men who ever lived.

After Albuquerque's era, King Manoel would further expand the Portuguese empire:

Bengal and Siam were reached, Fernao Pires de Andrade reached Canton, and by 1594, the Portuguese received exclusive entrance into the market of the Ming dynasty emporium through Lampo, also known as Ning-Po.

The Portuguese would lease Macao in 1557 to improve their trade with the Far East. In 1542, Japan was reached by merchants and Saint Francis Xavier.

56.6.4 The Arrival of the de Silva Family in Sri Lanka

We will now focus more on the Portuguese presence in Sri Lanka. Remember that Belgium was Spanish when the Portuguese got involved in Sri Lanka. Trade flourished between Lisboa and Antwerp and, of course, also Cadiz and Antwerp.

Before the Dutch revolt and long before Amsterdam gained importance, the VOC would conquer many parts of the world. In Antwerp, in (nowadays) Belgium, the demand for Sri Lankan treasures such as gemstones, as in Figure 56.33, pearls, cinnamon, and other goods snowballed. Other cities such as Florence, Venice, Spain, and Portugal became interested in these goods. The Pope was also involved in the new territories, including India and the island of Sri Lanka.

It should, therefore, not be a surprise that the Portuguese attempted to settle in Sri Lanka too. Their naval ambitions and experiences almost entirely determined the Portuguese identity and are indicated everywhere, such as in Figure 56.23. Even early on, related to Francisco de Almeida's journey, Sri Lanka (Ceylam) was targeted as described above.

A quote in the book of da Silva shows that de Almeida had received the following instructions (sic, translated by da Silva):

'You send a pair of a caravel or whatever else shall seem suitable, and you can well spare, to discover Ceylam, and Pegu and Malacca and any other places and things of those parts, sending in the said vessels that you thus send a person who shall have the chief charge of them, and one who will do it very well and with all regard to and security of our service, and in the said places and all others and any ports and countries that they shall discover they place our padraos of stone, with our royal arms and the cross of Christos at the top, which padraos you shall order to stone-cutters who go to make them.'

Indeed, thanks to such padraos (granite stone pillars), most of the claims of discoveries by the Portuguese have been confirmed in the 20th century after archaeological excavations in many places in the world, such as the mouth of the Congo River in Africa.

Lorenzo de Almeida, instructed by his father Francisco, undertook the task partially. He had to block the sea route between Sri Lanka and the Maldives through which Muslim merchants naturally passed to reach the island, Malacca, Bengal, and other places. The first voyage of Lorenzo de Almeida to Sri Lanka is important for Sri Lanka, India, and Portugal, but it also shines a light on Christopher Columbus's identity.

De Almeida left Cochin in 1505, accompanied by regular soldiers and Fidalgos (knights) such as Fernao Cutrim and Payo de Souza, his father's ambassadors. Also, an interpreter and even Friar Vincente were on board, and they would later play an essential role in the early Christianisation of Sri Lanka.

Because of a massive storm, the fleet arrived further south than expected, namely in Galle. As soon as the weather permitted, they left Galle and sailed north to arrive at Colomtota.

Galle is shown in Figures 56.24, 56.25, 56.26, 56.27, 56.28, 56.29, 56.31 and 56.32, and is still an important harbor.

Modern scholars believe that the word Colomtota or Colontota has a similar structure, such as places like Hambantota, Angurwatota, Bentota etc. It would, therefore, come from the Harbor of Kelaniya ('Kelani-Tota'). Kelani is a river, and the site is at the mouth of that river. So, it consists, apparently, of the words Colom and Tota.

Still, in Chapter 52, the author described the possibility that the word may come from ancient Greek and may refer to local fish found or sold in that place during an encounter with the Greeks.

Lorenzo de Almeida immediately transformed it to Columbo, which sounds similar to the word Colambu as the Arabs called the place or the other name of the area, Colompura or Colomtota.

Very likely, de Almeida associated the word Colom[8] with Columbo. It makes sense that the Portuguese named the harbor after Christopher Columbus, conveniently similar to its original name.

However, the harbor had flourished way before the Portuguese arrival and had been inhabited by Arab merchants for several centuries. The harbor was regularly visited by ships from Bengal, Gujerat, Malacca, Ormuz, and India's Coromandel coast.

The Arabs traded in many places in Asia and the Middle East, including Sri Lankan cinnamon, areca nuts, coconuts, small elephants, timber, gold, silver, cotton, silk, and Persian wines. Throughout the island's history, it's characteristic that the Sri Lankans have always been suppliers of goods but have yet to merchandise themselves in other areas.

Sri Lanka's economy and military defense have always relied on foreign enterprises, such as the Arabs and Indians, the Portuguese, the VOC, the British, the Soviets, the tourists, and the Chinese. These enterprises have enriched Sri Lanka's culture and DNA but have yet to reveal their capacity to become self-reliant.

An island with limited resources can only partially become independent. Still, the vast supplies of possible energy harvesting sources, such as dams, sea waves, and wind, may turn the tide if they want to. In recent times, significant efforts were undertaken by Priyantha Dissanayake in Figure 56.40 on page 1105.

Duarte Barbosa described the event of Lorenzo de Almeida reaching Colombo[9]. We can cite his description:

'Leaving the Island of Mahaldiva further on towards the east, where the cape of Comory is doubled and thirty-eight leagues from the cape itself, there is a huge and beautiful island which the Moors, Arabs and Persians and our people call Ceylam, and the Indians call Ylinarim. It is a rich and luxuriant land inhabited by Gentiles and ruled by a Gentile king. Many Moors live in large quarters in the island's seaports, and all the inhabitants are great merchants. There are fifty leagues of the channel towards the northeast from the cape until the island of Maylepur is passed. Both Moors and Gentiles are well-made men, almost white and mostly stout, with large stomachs and luxurious. They do not understand nor possess arms. They are all given to trade and good living. They go bare from the waist upwards and below that cover themselves with good clothes of silk and cotton, caps on their heads, and the ears pierced with large holes, in which they wear many gold rings and jewelry, so much that their very ears reach to their shoulders and many rings and precious jewels on their fingers, they wear belts of gold richly adorned with precious stones. Their language is partly Malabar and partly Cholomendel, and many Malabar Moors come to live on this island because it is so luxuriant, abundant, and very healthy. Men live longer here than in India.'

We may assume that Barbosa meant, by gentiles, people or tribes who were neither Arabs nor Jews.

[8] Colom is Catalan for Columbus, but one must not conclude that he was Catalan since, in those days, it was common to use local versions of names, even when the person was from a different area or country.

[9] Duarte Barbosa, in Hak. Soc. MCMXXI, p 117 and Royal Asiatic Society (Ceylon Branch), vol XIX Nr 59, page 379.

Interestingly, they were wearing 'caps.' This refers to the traditional caps or plates, typically made of metal, worn by the Karava of Sri Lanka. Still, it may also refer to hats usually worn by Muslims.

Later sources also infer a big Arack and Opium consumption in Colombo, which is probably typical for such international harbors. Several sources indicate that such manners existed before the Portuguese' arrival and were even hated by the Portuguese. Thus, one should not blame Western decadence for the alcohol consumption in Sri Lanka.

When the Portuguese first arrived in Colombo, along the coast from Galle, as in Figure 56.34, the Kingdom of Kotte did not know how to react. They had allied with the Arabs, who used to possess a monopoly on trade, but soon, they figured out that the Portuguese would be too strong to fight. As in Figure 56.36, the Sri Lankan ships alone were no match against the Portuguese.

Soon, a Portuguese delegation was sent from the fleet to the Kotte palace. The Singhalese kept Don Lorenzo de Almeida hostage to ensure that the Portuguese would not harm him, while the escort led the Portuguese from the fleet to the Kotte palace along a circuitous route that took three days.

The long, winding path gave the impression that the Palace was far from the fleet. There is still a proverb in Sri Lanka referring to this event: Paranyiya Kotte giyawage, which is used when describing a long and winding route from one place to another and means 'as the Portuguese went to Kotte.'

However, the Singhalese could not fool the Portuguese because their ships fired a gun every hour, which allowed them to keep track of time and orientation. The Portuguese in charge of the escort to the Palace was Cutrim.

A second delegation led by Payo de Souza would be majestic and include elephants sent by Dharma Parakrama Bahu.

Queiroz wrote about Payo de Souza's meeting with the King of Kotte, which was cited in da Silva's book, which we have rephrased for clarity.

'He met the King in a large and dim hall, ornamented with Persian carpets. The King was dressed in a white 'cabaya' , and he was seated on a throne of ivory, delicately wrought, on a dais of six steps, covered with a cloth of gold. On his head was a kind of mitre of brocade, garnished with precious stones and large pearls. The mitre had two points of 'sausatos' of first-rate craft falling on his shoulder. He was girt with a cloth of silver, the ends of which fell on his feet. His feet were shod with sandals studded with rubies. On his fingers were a vast number of rubies and also diamonds and emeralds. His ears were pierced and fell to his shoulders with earrings of great value. Around the King were many silver scones and torch stands, which shed light to dispel the building's darkness. On each side of the hall, a row of men brightly clad in their fashion with naked swords hanging and shields on their arms. Between the two rows, the ambassadors advanced, dressed in green velvet with loops of silver and carrying a sword of the same metal. The King opened the meeting with a long introductory speech in which he ensured that the King of Portugal was not more powerful than the greatest Pagode and then came to business... '

It is known that a treaty was signed between the Singhalese and the Portuguese in 1518.

Several writers, such as Castaneda, Queiroz, Silva, Barro, and Correa, have different opinions on whether or not a treaty was formed when Payo de Souza met the King, whether Lorenzo de Almeida established an agreement when he landed in Galle or whether no deal ever existed before 1518.

56.6.5 The Portuguese Settling in Sri Lanka

Anyhow, Correa mentions that,

'Diogo de Almeida (who was the emissary of Lorenço de Almeida and likely his uncle), told that the Portuguese established a friendship with the King of Kotte and that, in return for that friendship, they promised to protect the harbors and waters of the Kotte Kingdom against any hostility from other nations. In return, the King of Kotte provided gifts in a few shiploads of cinnamon and two elephants.'

One must conclude that there must have been, at least, a verbal agreement between the monarch and the Portuguese. Historians argue that the King of Kotte must have been so willing towards the Portuguese because he had heard of their military strength shown before and that he believed such a strong ally would guarantee the safety of Kotte and preserve its access to world trade.

The Portuguese decided to construct their feitoria on the southwest side of the bay. They built a chapel there of San Lourenço, named after the patron saint of Lourenço de Almeida. San Lourenço has been the patron of Colombo ever since. Just as anywhere else the Portuguese 'landed,' a padrao was cut by a stonecutter,[10] the Portuguese shield was engraved, the Cross of Christ as well. This padrao, shown in Figure 56.37, would later be excavated near Colombo's breakwater in 1898 and was located in the Gordon Gardens in the 1990s. We wonder if it is still located there.

56.6.6 The First Portuguese arrival in Sri Lanka in 1506

Experts assume that the events took place between September 1505 and May 1506. The padrao indicates on its right-hand side 'ISOI,' which probably stands for 'Iesus Salvator Orientalium Indiorum'

Not indicating a year on the padrao was no exception. For instance, the padrao of Sunda Kalapa in Jakarta dates from 1522, but there is no date written on it. Instead, there is 'OSPOR .ESFERa/Mo,' which stands for 'O Senhor de Portugal. Esfera/Espera do Mundo.'

The padrao at the mouth of the Congo River, from 1485, does not indicate a year, but rather,

'Aqui chegaram os navios do esclarecido rei D.Joao II de Portugal - Diogo Cao, Pero Anes, Pero da Costa.'

Chandra R. de Silva[11] reported a thorough overview of the existing literature concerning the first arrival date of the Portuguese in Sri Lanka, which we summarize her. He writes that Donald Ferguson[12] argued that the advent of the Portuguese, led by Dom Lourenco de Almeida, could not have occurred in 1505 as is commonly believed, but in 1506. Ferguson noted that had the Portuguese arrived in Sri Lanka in 1505, correspondence regarding this discovery would have been sent to Portugal aboard the S. Gabriel, which sailed from India in February 1506 and arrived in Lisbon in late 1506 or early 1507, departed India in February 1506.

If this is the case, it is difficult to explain why the King of Portugal delayed his correspondence with the Pope until September 1507 regarding this 'finding,' deemed significant enough to necessitate a parade in Rome on December 21, 1507. As Chandra R. de Silva[13] states, Ferguson also noted that the absence of any mention of the first interaction in 1505 by Viceroy Dom Francisco de Almeida in his December 16, 1505 letter to King Manuel raises concerns.

In addition, it was emphasized to him that the directives sent to the Portuguese Viceroy mandated the start of exploratory expeditions only after the vessels were loaded with goods destined for Portugal. This was unfinished until the early 1506s.

Moreover, two envoys purportedly sent to the King of Kotte were unlikely to be there in 1505. In 1505, Payo de Souza, one of the envoys, was still en route to India.

In contrast, Ferno Cotrim, writes that, until the middle of the twentieth century, 1505 was widely accepted as the date of the first interaction between historians and the general populations of Sri Lanka and Portugal. He explains in more detail that Ferno de Queyroz's account primarily supports the assertion that the first meeting occurred in 1505.

Queyroz's publication, first published in Portuguese in 1914 and then translated into English in 1930, is the most authoritative Portuguese account of the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century interactions between Sri Lanka and Portugal.[14] Queyroz produced literary works during the 1680s.

Nonetheless, Chandra R. de Silva[15] states it is plausible that he acquired his knowledge from the works of Diogo do Couto, a notable author whose career began in the 1590s.

Both parties may have relied on the account given by Ferno Lopes de Castaneda, a writer from the 1540s, who stated that the first encounter occurred in 1505.[16]

Ferguson deemed Gaspar Correia, the only chronicler whose writings gestured at the potential of a Portuguese entry in 1506, unreliable.

De Silva reintroduced the 1506 date proposed by Ferguson to the ongoing discussion.[17] He drew attention to a source from the same period that provided information regarding the precise date of the Portuguese landing in Sri Lanka.

The primary source under consideration is a pamphlet written in Spanish by Juan Augur and published for the first time in Salamanca in 1512.

Martin Fernandes de Figueroa's first-hand account of the events in the Eastern region served as the primary source. The report provides a chronicle of Dom Lourenco de Almeida's activities until March 1506. The text then states that on August 8, Dom Lourenco, the Viceroy's son, set sail with a fleet of seven ships. This expedition's objective was to investigate the islands near Cochin. The fleet reached Ceylon, an island known for its cinnamon production,[18] despite confronting severe cyclones and unfavorable conditions and anchored there.

As evidenced by several academic sources,[19] 1506 has since been widely accepted as a plausible alternative. This date is gaining acceptance among historians, whereas 1505 remains significant in conventional historical accounts.

In 1980, Genevieve Bouchon analyzed a Portuguese stone inscription in Colombo that read "1501." Based on her findings, Genevieve Bouchon posited that the initial encounter may have occurred before de Almeida's arrival. This prospective encounter may have involved a ship from Joo da Nova's first armada, which arrived in the Indian Ocean.[20] This idea has garnered minimal to negligible support. There have been suggestions that the inscription should be read as "JSOI" instead of "1501," signifying Jesus Salvator Orientalium Indiorum or 'Jesus, Savior of the East Indies.'[21]

According to Jorge Flores, the 1501 thesis needs more support from the available data due to the absence of a reference to the 'discovery' of Sri Lanka in a contemporary account of Joo da Nova's voyage. More evidence supporting the concept of 'discovery' needs to be provided in the articles published between 1501 and 1505.

King Manuel ordered Dom Francisco de Almeida in 1505 to 'discover' Ceylon, although Joo da Nova's ships had already sighted the island.

Flores asks astutely why King Manuel issued these orders, given that Joo da Nova's ships had already observed the island.[22]

Scholars like Chandra R. de Silva[23] therefore reject 1501 and instead assume, based on more solid evidence, that the first visit occurred in 1506.

56.6.7 The First 'Feitoria' in Colombo

The first factor of the first Portuguese feitoria in Colombo was Jane Mendes Cardosa. He was in charge, together with a small Portuguese group. After this primordial visit, the Portuguese fleet left Sri Lanka, and the promised goods, including the elephants, were taken with them. One elephant would ultimately arrive in Portugal and was the first Indian Elephant ever to come to Europe. The success in Sri Lanka by Lourenço de Almeida and his compatriots was duly celebrated in Cochin in India by his father, Francisco de Almeida, the Viceroy of India, and a celebration included bullfights.

The Viceroy ratified the treaty between the Kingdom of Kotte in Sri Lanka and Portugal. The Viceroy's nephew, Diego de Almeida, mentioned above, was sent to Portugal as an eyewitness to the discovery of Sri Lanka. This must indeed be considered evidence that the characters found on the padrao in Sri Lanka may not have been '1501' but 'ISOI,' as stated by da Silva.

Historian Correa wrote that Diego de Almeida had been the first ambassador to Kotte and likely joined the second delegation to arrive later in Sri Lanka. Some impressions of Colombo are shown in Figure 56.36. Undoubtedly, the harbor and town would have been very different had the Portuguese not been in charge.

On November 7, 1506, in Rome, under the title 'Gesta proxima per Portugalenses, in India, Ethiopia et allis orientalibus terris,' the letter of King Manoel to the Pope's representative in Portugal, Cardinal Alpedrinha, archbishop of Oporto, was published, describing the King's activities in Asia. The King expressed his desire to expand Portugal's influence globally as far as Ceylao (Sri Lanka).

In March of 1506, he wrote a letter to India's Viceroy to build a fortification in Sri Lanka, acting as a Seat. The reason was linked to its strategic location, which was necessary for military bases, and its richness in spices, etc. However, it would take another decade before the fortification would be constructed.

The letter of King Manoel, written in March, was finally dispatched to the Viceroy of India on December 27, 1506.[24] The letter was sent with Cide Barbudo, and a summary would later appear in Albuquerque's cartas. A translation of one passage in the letter is as follows:

'Dom Lourenço de Almeida discovered Ceylon, a point similar to Cananor where a fortress can be constructed. In that location, there is plenty of water, and there is an excellent port. This place is to be chosen and not Coulam. Furthermore, Ceilam is on the direct course to Malaca, Pegu, Cametra, and Coromandel. From the latter to Ceilam is seventy leagues.'

Consequently, on September 25, 1507, a letter from the Portuguese city of Abrantes was written in Latin to Pope Julius II. The letter addresses a laudatio to several people, including Payo de Souza in particular, which mentioned a detail about the King of Kotte, namely,

'... On the throne was the King, who, according to the fashion of his country, was wearing a diadem on his head, adorned with precious stones found on the island.'

Such a wreath must have been fashionable in the community of Kotte. Undoubtedly, the Karava caste was wearing it, too, though probably without the precious stones.

Later, a procession was held in Rome on December 21, 1507, in honor of Portugal's discoveries.

That Colombo was considered a Portuguese town can be uncovered in certain remains at the National Museum of Sri Lanka, such as in Figure 56.37.

56.6.8 The First Troubles between the Portuguese and the Locals

When the Portuguese landed in Sri Lanka and a partnership was formed with the King of Kotte, the Sri Lankans depended on the Portuguese for trade and military protection. Nevertheless, the first months were challenging for the early settlers. The new balance of power was not exactly according to the desires of the Muslim traders who had lost their monopoly of trade and commerce. They poked the Sinhalese to discomfort the Portuguese. For this reason, the Portuguese pulled back from their newly established factory in Colombo in 1507. This was done without hard feelings towards the people and the King of Kotte because the Portuguese knew that the discomfort had not been intended by them but was organized by the Moors. The withdrawal did not please the King of Portugal because he wanted Sri Lanka to become a vital outpost along the route to Malacca. For this reason, he ordered Diogo Lopes de Sequeira to solidify the journey to Malacca by mapping it out and fortifying different posts as needed. He was explicitly asked to support the Viceroy in defending each fortress and the subjects residing there. De Sequeira concluded that the Sri Lanka settlement was necessary and required essential support from Portugal, which helped the Viceroy of India re-initiate a fortification.

The letter of de Almeida, written in the Fall of 1508 to the King of Portugal, stated,

'regarding Ceylao, I have already informed your Highness that men who went there, and that those who have now come from there, found the country quiet, and that there is a padrao standing there, placed by my son. I have said to Your Highness that a fortress would be good there because all the vessels that come from the south, that is, from all parts of Malacca, Çamatra, Pedir, Bengala, and Pegu, cannot reach the northern region without passing close to this island of Ceylao, and even have to navigate with certainty and obliged to come in sight of it, and that, if necessary, half a dozen ships could stop this route to them. The fortress could be made without danger on a point that overlooks the port. At Cananor, there is an excellent water well. May it please God to direct us to do this to the increase in your service.'

The Viceroy of India, de Almeida, lost his son Lourenço de Almeida in a battle with the Moors, particularly the Egyptians. The Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, as in Figure 56.38, were crucial locations then. Indeed, the early years in India also provoked hostilities by the regime of the Zamorin of Calicut.

The actions of Cabral and Vasco de Gama had not precisely made him happy. Also, the alliance with neighboring Cochin and Cannanore, the substitution of the Muslims' trade monopoly, and so on led to a coalition against the Portuguese between the zamorin of Calicut and the Muslims. First, the Portuguese fortress of Cannanore was besieged. It was soon relieved by the fleet of Tristao de Cunha, after which Almeida destroyed the Zamorin fleet. Consequently, an Egyptian fleet sailed for Diu, from where it intended to attack the Portuguese navy. To counter this attack, viceroy de Almeida sent a fleet North to engage in a fierce battle just South of Bombay for two days with the Egyptians. The Egyptians won this battle, in which the Viceroy's son, Lourenço de Almeida, was also killed.

The Viceroy avenged his son's death by launching a massive attack on the Egyptian and the Calicut fleet in February of 1509, which expelled the Egyptians and restored Portugal's supremacy. De Almeida had to transfer his power to Albuquerque, which he refused until he had avenged his son's death in the just-mentioned battle. This refusal then forced Affonço de Albuquerque, appointed as the new Viceroy, to take de Almeida prisoner for a while. Affonço de Albuquerque conquered Goa, Malaca and Ormuz. However, he did not make much effort to build a fortress in Sri Lanka. Indeed, he preferred Cochin as the Portuguese empire's seat in the region and later chose Goa. Some historians assume he was not interested in Sri Lanka because he considered it a treasure of his rival de Almeida.

In contrast, others state that Sri Lanka's situation was not sufficiently clear and robust in that period as the Kingdom of Kotte went through a disputed succession of the throne.

56.6.9 The Construction of the First Fortress in Colombo in 1518

It would take until late 1518 for Lopo Soarez de Albergaria, Albuquerque's successor, to follow the royal instructions again by erecting a fortress in Sri Lanka. Indeed, he instructed Joao de Silveira[25], his nephew residing in Bengal, to secretly inspect the port of Colombo and make specific plans for the construction.

Then, in September 1518, a massive armada of about 25 vessels left Cochin and dispatched around 1500 European cavaliers, soldiers, seamen, stonemasons, and Goan quarrymen, together with munitions and material, to Colombo to construct a fortress there.

To preserve peace with the King of Kotte, Joao Froles was sent to assure the King that the fortress had to be built to protect Kotte and the Portuguese factory. Against the King of Kotte's will, there has been resistance to the Portuguese arrival, mainly inflicted by and from the suburbs of Colombo inhabited by the Muslims. These hostilities were followed by heavy Portuguese gunfire. The King of Kotte has apologized for the confrontations and sent local masons to help with the fortress's construction.

A fortress was constructed of mud, wood, and stone on the rock, chosen by the Portuguese. The rock was protected from the rest of Colombo by digging water canals. The roof of the fortress was made of cadjan. The fort would be named Santa Barbara[26] after it had first been named 'Nossa Senhora das Virtudes.' It appears as Santa Barbara in Correa's textitLendas de India. The fortress had a triangular-shaped wall. On each corner, there was a two-story tower. In the center was another tower. It was very likely that the middle tower was used as a gunpowder mill, somewhat similar to the one that would later be built at Uduwara, described in Chapter 61.4.4. Da Silva writes that the warehouses and the quarters for the soldiers and officials adjoined the central tower. Interestingly, this is similar to what can be found at the fortress of Uduwara. The workers were housed in huts outside this significant construction.

After the fortress's construction, a new treaty was established between the Portuguese and the Kingdom of Kotte. Gifts were exchanged as well.

Satisfied by everything that had been established, Governor Albergaria departed from Sri Lanka in October 1518 and left a fortress packed with provisions, ammunition, and artillery. The King of Kotte was extremely friendly towards the Portuguese and their presence on the island. The King also promised to provide the Portuguese residents with goods regularly.

The fortress of Colombo was now an official Portuguese entity, and men were appointed to take leadership roles. From Bengal's return, da Silveira was appointed captain of the fort. Antonio de Miranda de Azevedo would be captain-major of the seas and was responsible for guarding the port and scanning the waters for vessels. Diogo de Lemos was appointed factor. Besides, a chaplain remained at Colombo for spiritual matters.

Soon after, the fortress was attacked several times by coalitions of Sinhalese and Calicut supporters who found the Portuguese presence a disadvantage for their economic and political establishments. In 1519, for instance, the alliance penetrated the fortress and was led by Vijaya Bahu but was repelled by da Silveira's leadership. Also, battles took place at sea between Antonio de Miranda de Azevedo and the Zamorin fleet.

56.6.10 The Construction of a Stronger Fortress in Colombo in 1519

Consequently, Governor Diogo Lopez de Sequeira decided to upgrade the fortress in Colombo to a more substantial fortification capable of easily withstanding similar attacks. Additionally, he planned to replace the officials in Colombo with more competent men.

In late 1519, Lopo de Brito arrived as the new captain of the fort, tasked with overseeing the upgrade. He brought with him 400 skilled workers, including carpenters and stonemasons. Oyster shells were obtained from the Pearl Fishery of Kilakari in the Gulf of Mannar to produce lime for the walls. Besides constructing a better-fortified fortress, several houses were also built. In response to continued local attacks and economic sanctions, the Portuguese retaliated by setting homes on fire along what is now known as the Leyden-Bastain road in Colombo.[27]

Supported by the local population and aware that food shortages and possibly disease had weakened the fortress's community, Vijaya Bahu attacked the fort on May 21, 1521, with a large army. Assistance from Goa was impossible due to the Monsoon. Despite this, the fort withstood the attack, enduring a five-month siege before being saved by the Portuguese. They executed a surprise attack from within the fort, supported by troops from Goa under the command of Antonio de Lemos.

Simultaneously, Colombo was subjected to continuous bombardment, with scenes of destruction similar to those depicted in Figure 56.36. During the conflict, the Muslim quarters were burned, and the mosques were destroyed. Vijaya Bahu eventually surrendered, leading to the establishment of a new peace agreement.

56.6.11 The Portuguese and their Involvements in the Kingdom of Kotte

The fortress of Colombo within the Kingdom of Kotte might have maintained a status quo if not for the kingdom's internal political problems related to the succession of the throne. These issues ultimately paved the way for the Portuguese to gain influence over the Kingdom of Kotte.

A dispute among the King's descendants led to assaults and, ultimately, the King's death. Subsequently, the ministers selected the eldest son, Bhuvaneka Bahu, as the new King of the reduced Kingdom of Kotte, leaving two smaller kingdoms to the other princes. The regions of Raigam, Pasdun, and Wallawiti Corrales, which lost their seaports, became known as Raigam Bandara and were given to Prince Paraja Singha. The areas of Denawaka, the four Corrales, and some Corrales around the Sitawaka Ganga were named Sitawaka and went to Prince Mayadunne.

Although smaller than before, the Kingdom of Kotte remained the most abundant region in Sri Lanka. However, this was not the end of internal strife, as more assaults from family members ensued.

The succession wars in Sri Lanka allowed de Brito to strengthen the fortress of Colombo. To avoid entanglement in the troubles of Kotte, de Brito's successor, Fernão Gomes de Lemos, convinced the Portuguese King to limit their presence in Sri Lanka to just the factory, foregoing any territorial ambitions. De Lemos feared that maintaining a stronger position in Sri Lanka would require excessive resources and efforts, which would impede their activities along the Malabar coast and control over the seas to Malacca. Thus, additional measures to strengthen their hold in Sri Lanka were avoided to focus on their broader strategic interests.

56.6.12 The Dismantling of the Fortress in 1524 to Preserve the Peace with Kotte

Governor Duarte de Menezes agreed and emphasized that only the cinnamon trade would maintain the Portuguese interest in the region.

The strategic and diplomatic reasons mentioned above led to Vasco da Gama, serving as the second Viceroy of India, to dismantle the fortress of Colombo in 1524 by the order of King João III. The primary purpose was to re-establish good relations with the Sri Lankans while preserving the lucrative cinnamon trade.

After the fortress was dismantled, the factor Nuno Freyre de Andrade remained at the factory with a clerical assistant and 20 soldiers for protection, operating under the aegis of Bhuvaneka Bahu, the King of Kotte. The disappearance of Colombo's fortress brought mixed reactions.

On the one hand, it was a relief for the King as he knew that the residents did not favor the fort, and its demise meant that Muslims could no longer incite the populace against him. However, this also made the Kingdom of Kotte more vulnerable to attacks from abroad and within the kingdom.

[26] Santa Barbara was typical for Spanish fortifications and ammunition stores and was also found in Belgium, for instance, in Melin near Jodoigne

[27] That is, of course, the modern designation.

Despite the absence of the fortress, Kotte and Colombo became increasingly influenced by the Portuguese through the exchange of knowledge and cultural integration, including mixed marriages. An interesting recent example of this cultural blend can be seen in Figure 56.36, depicting a scene in Portugal that strikingly resembles Sri Lanka.

56.6.13 The Weakened Colombo was under Attack by Muslims from 1525 onwards

The Muslims in Kotte immediately re-established their ties with the Malabar coast. In February 1525, they invited the naval commander Ali Hassan of the Zamorin of Calicut, who promptly ordered the remaining Portuguese to surrender.

The Portuguese, supported by the Sinhalese under Salappu Aratchie, launched a surprise attack, causing the men of the Zamorin to flee. Some retreated to Calicut, while others sought refuge in Sitawaka.

Ali Hassan later returned, demanding the Portuguese's surrender once again. However, this attempt was also thwarted by the combined forces of the Portuguese and Sinhalese, this time commanded by Virapuli Aratchie. In the ensuing conflict, four Calicut ships were captured. The King of Kotte invited the wounded Portuguese to recuperate and receive treatment at his hospital.

Distrustful of the Muslims due to their perceived betrayal and encouragement of troublemakers, King Bhuvanaka Bahu, expelled them from Kotte. Accusations of treason led to their banishment.

In response, the Muslims allied against the Kingdom of Kotte, including Sitawaka and Calicut. They promised to cede some of Sri Lanka's ports and transform the island into a vassal state of Calicut. Da Silva suggests that the King of Sitawaka agreed to this alliance not out of opposition to the Portuguese but to usurp the throne of Kotte from his brother. This ambition is evident as he later chose to become a vassal of the Portuguese.

For a decade, Sri Lanka was embroiled in a struggle between the Calicut-Sitawaka and the Kotte-Portuguese alliances. Upon hearing about the potential invasion by the Calicut-Sitawaka alliance and the preparations being made at the naval base of Ponani, just south of Calicut, King Bhuvanaka Bahu urgently requested military assistance from Goa. This request should be seen as a continuation of the longstanding conflict between the Portuguese and Calicut, driven by the Zamorin's desire to maintain control over trade with the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf.

From 1530 onwards, spices from Ceylon no longer arrived in Spain or Portugal but instead in Antwerp in the Spanish Netherlands (Belgium). This shift facilitated more straightforward trade and shipment to the rest of Europe. Interestingly, specific trades like tobacco still pass through Antwerp today.

56.6.14 Rescue of Kotte by the Portuguese from Goa in 1538

The Calicut-Sitawaka alliance ordered the surrender of Kotte and besieged the Kingdom. The Portuguese, who had an agreement of protection with Kotte enforced by several treaties, sent Martim Afonso de Melo Jusarte with an expeditionary force to help Kotte in 1538. Martim Afonso de Sousa also came to aid from Chale. He had previously assisted in early 1537 when Mayadunne and Ali Ibrahim besieged Kotte on behalf of the Zamorin of Calicut.

In defense of the city of Kotte, the Portuguese used and taught many European techniques. It is even said that alligators were used to protect the lakes around the city from trespassing. Whenever possible, an advantage was taken of the Monsoon, as in Figure 56.36, to flood certain parts just as the Europeans in Belgium and the Netherlands used to do.

Soon, the territories that once belonged to the extensive Kingdom of Kotte had been cut from the remaining smaller Kingdom. The latter was in dire straits because there was no suitable successor for King Bhuvaneka Bahu. It was the year 1538, and it was clear that a collapse was nearby. The King had a daughter with his chief Queen named Samudra Devi. The King wanted her to marry Yogo Bandara, but soon this person was murdered by Vidya Bandara, who had a relationship with Samudra Devi. Therefore, the couple had a love marriage soon after, which would typically have secured the succession of the throne if a male son were born out of this marriage. However, this possibility was considered a direct threat by the King's brother Mayadunne, who had hoped that no successor would be found and he would inherit the throne. The couple soon had a boy, Dharmapala, who would become the next, and as it would turn out, the last King of Kotte.

Returning to 1538, Mayadunne soon attacked the Kingdom of Kotte with Zamorin's help because he saw his position as a possible heir to the throne endangered by the new developments. At this decisive moment, the Portuguese, both military and civilians, saved Kotte. The Portuguese army was quickly reinforced by new contingents from Goa, led by Miguel Ferreira, a nobleman from Alcobaça in Portugal. Ferreira captured the Calicut fleet in the estuary of Negombo and burned it. When Mayadunne noticed he could not withstand the Portuguese force, he retreated. The King of Kotte realized that Mayadunne would always be dangerous to his throne and asked the Portuguese to go after him. A force of 300 Portuguese and 7000 Kotte troops, followed by even more soldiers, was directed towards Sitawaka along the Kelani River.

Mayadunne was not entirely crushed by his brother and the Portuguese but was spared after rather excessive surrender actions, which included killing allies from Calicut, offering his 8-year-old son as a hostage, and more.

Had the Kingdom of Kotte not been able to count on help from the Portuguese at this moment, the country may have been crushed, and Calicut and their Muslim allies would have ruled half of Sri Lanka.

However, having been rescued by the Portuguese made the King of Kotte a vassal of the Portuguese instead of an ally. There were several complaints in the period that followed, sent to the King of Portugal by the Kingdom of Kotte, about the behavior of some Portuguese, their disrespect of the locals, and their denial of fair trade rules, which would have been natural if each party had treated the other as equals.

The introduction of the Christian religion resulted in the King of Kotte slowly losing feudal power over his subjects. Later, when the King's heir, Dharmapala, died and there were no other heirs, the Portuguese expressed interest in taking over the rule of the Kingdom of Kotte.

56.6.15 The Crown of Portugal steadily became the heir of the Throne of Kotte

In 1541, the grandson of the King of Kotte was still alive, and the King sought to secure his succession. Despite the diplomatic drawbacks stemming from hostility towards the Portuguese from neighboring kingdoms and some factions within Kotte, he proposed that the Portuguese make his grandson Dharmapala the new King of Kotte.

Consequently, a golden effigy was sent to Lisbon with ambassadors Sri Radaraksa Panditer and Sallupu Aratchie, where it was crowned. Thus, Dharmapala officially became the King of Kotte and a feudal vassal of Portugal's King João III. Seizing this opportunity, the King of Portugal dispatched more Christian missionaries to Sri Lanka. The delegation returned to Kotte in 1543, including seven Franciscan missionaries.

After 1553, the balance of power in Sri Lanka was strained as various parties sought Portuguese support to gain control over more parts of the country, including the Kingdom of Kandy. Internal rivalries and defense weaknesses in different regions also became apparent. Christianity was often used to gain favor with the Portuguese by converting for favors and establishing new balances across the island. During this period, several prominent Sri Lankans were baptized and received Portuguese first names preceded by 'Dom,' such as Dom João, Dom Manoel, and Dom Luís.

Later, Portuguese family names were added upon conversion to Christianity. Examples include Dom João de Castro, Martin Affonço, Nuno Álvares, Pero Vaz, and André de Souza. These names and family names were those of the godfathers during the respective baptisms. Many such baptisms took place at the highest levels in the Kingdom to appease the Portuguese and ensure they had no religious reasons to invade the Kingdom, under the motto "better to be friends than enemies." However, this conversion did not exclude Buddhism. Even though the King of Kandy became a Christian, Buddhist monuments continued to be constructed. The Portuguese soon assumed that the King of Kandy was not a practicing Christian but had only converted to please them. They believed, however, that the King would wholeheartedly become a Christian and convert his entire Kingdom once the Governor of Portuguese India visited and once he became King of every part of Sri Lanka except the Kingdom of Kotte.

Soon, the Portuguese learned that the King of Kandy was dishonest and had misused his promise of conversion to gain more power. After several spies informed him of his plans, Barreto was the first to see through the King's intentions.

The Kingdom of Kotte, under King Bhuvanekabahu VII, was a vassal state of the Portuguese. However, besides Kotte and Kandy, there was still Mayadunne, who sought to take Kotte since he had been unable to conquer the Kingdom of Kandy. In the following sections, we will highlight the lives of Mayadunne and his son Rajasinghe I, who played essential roles in opposing the Portuguese and their Kingdom of Kotte.

We will also examine the Kings of Kotte before the arrival of the Portuguese, the lineage of the Kings of Sitawaka who descended from them, and how they eventually became Kings of Kandy, forming the opposition against the Portuguese and later the VOC.

Before discussing Portuguese Ceylon in detail, we will focus on Samarakoon Rala, who commanded the army of Kotte and was responsible for establishing the fortress of Uduwara.

56.7 About Samara de Cunha y Rala ('Samarakoon')

. Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, commonly known as Samarakoon or Samarakoon Rala in Sri Lankan history, was a figure of notable significance due to his military and social contributions.

His name, Samarakoon, adopted by the Sinhalese for its ease of pronunciation, also connoted his status as a war hero in their language.

Samarakoon was of mixed heritage, encompassing Spanish, Sri Lankan, and Indian ancestry, which played a pivotal role in his identity and affiliations.

As a critical commander on the Portuguese side during the Battle of Uduwara, Samarakoon Rala oversaw the construction of a fortress, which became a strategic military installation. His prowess and loyalty to the Portuguese crown earned him the favor of de Acevedo, a prominent Portuguese figure of the time.

His leadership was a testament to his military acumen and his deeply ingrained pro-Portuguese sentiments. Born a Christian, Samarakoon's lineage was a blend of Portuguese and Sinhalese heritage, underscored by his father's identity, Edirille Aratchie, who was also a Christian.

Samarakoon's social circle and familial ties further cemented his alignment with the Portuguese. He was closely associated with the de Silva family, notable for their mixed Portuguese-Sinhalese lineage. This association extended to marriage bonds; his sister's marriage to Balthazar Moniz and his cousins Joao Vaz de Araujo and Luis de Carvalho, both aristocrats, reflect the intertwining of familial and political alliances.

The legacy of the de Silva family, particularly through Antonio Carvalho de Silva, is intricately connected to Samarakoon's story. Antonio, a patrilineal ancestor of Shirani de Silva, later reinforced the wooden fortress at Uduwara, originally established by Samarakoon, into a stone fortification. This transformation marked a significant development in the fort's history, depicting the enduring mark of these intertwined clans.

Samarakoon's brother, Dom Diogo Samarakoon Rala, or Don Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala, also played a critical role in the historical narrative.

Diogo's valor was epitomized during the Battle of Uduwara, where he saved King Dharmapala and his queen from being slaughtered by the armies of Domingos Correa and Appuhamy from Rayigam Korale. This act of bravery is commemorated in the central building of the fortress, now a Buddhist temple, symbolizing the intersection of military history and religious transformation.

The mingling of these familial lines is evidenced in the DNA, as discussed in Chapter 74.14, highlighting the genetic legacies that persist through generations. Thus, the tale of Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, Samarakoon Rala, is not only one of military strategy and heroism but also of cultural and genetic fusion.

56.8 Portuguese Ceylon

Dom João Dharmapala Peria Bandara was the last King of Kotte. His death on May 27, 1597, marked a significant transition as the Kingdom of Kotte became entirely governed by the Portuguese, initiating the era known as 'Portuguese Ceylon.'

This territory extended as a narrow strip along the southwest coast of Sri Lanka.

Portuguese Ceylon experienced fluctuating periods of stability, conflict, and political upheaval, with its military engagements and high-level political maneuvers prominently documented in historical records and scholarly works. However, for the coastal Sri Lankan population, this period signified cultural expansion, the formation of biological family ties with the Portuguese, and integration into the vast Iberian empire.

Unlike subsequent European settlers, the Portuguese did not inherently disdain the local population. Any social stratification or lack of respect stemmed from class distinctions similar to those in Portugal rather than race, language, or color.

The Portuguese found it natural to intermarry with locals, establishing deep familial bonds that have left a lasting legacy.

Despite subsequent colonization by the Dutch (VOC) and the British and the impacts of decades of independence and civil war, traces of Portuguese influence remain evident in Sri Lanka. This legacy illustrates that Sri Lanka once stood at the forefront of the modern era when global exploration, trade, and cultural exchange flourished.

The Portuguese influence persists in the Sri Lankan linguistic landscape. For example, the word tamai, meaning 'also' in Portuguese, PREFACE.

THE following pages are chiefly designed to assist individuals who may be desirous of acquiring the Portuguese Language as usually spoken in Ceylon.

The words used in this country are alone adopted; while their pronunciation is expressed as exactly as possible, by the parent alphabet. The orthography, however, seldom varies from that of the best Portuguese Dictionaries.

As the Sciences are little known, scientific terms in Ceylon Portuguese have but a limited range. Most of the inflective terminations, also, which abound in the parent tongue, are disused in this. Expressive particles, however, supply their place; and their loss is not to be deplored, as the primary words are elegantly long.

Many individuals, it may be observed, from inattention to the true orthography, are accustomed to write Portuguese in the Dutch alphabet. The language in so unsuitable a garb, is sufficient to awaken the suspicion and contempt of a stranger, and has probably given birth to the appelation of " Corrupt Portuguese!" and without close and candid examination, he would, in all probability, as soon suppose it the Otaheitan language in the Roman character, as recognize the features of a legitimate descendent of the Latin.

is still used in Sinhala. The genetic legacy of the Portuguese, along with other European and Asian influences, is visible in the faces of contemporary Sri Lankans.

The impact of Portuguese music is also evident. The rhythmic foundations of Portuguese music are present in Sri Lankan Baila music, much like in Konkani Baila music in Goa.

While Portuguese Fado music often reflects nostalgia, Sri Lankan Baila has evolved into a vibrant celebration of life.

The 1960s saw a revival and modernization of Baila music in Sri Lanka, spearheaded by Wally Bastiansz (1914-1985). He transformed Baila into a lively genre by incorporating popular musical instruments. His song 'Irené Josephine' exemplifies the fusion of traditional Baila rhythms with modern, singable lyrics.

Today, Baila is indispensable at Sri Lankan celebrations, with artists like Anton Rodrigo (d. 2008) and Mahagamage Samson Fernando (1931-1994) staple at any festive gathering.

In exploring the Portuguese-Sri Lankan ancestry, we find notable figures such as Carvalho, who served as the factor of Colombo in 1546, as documented by O. M. da Silva Cosme in his book on the Fidalgos of Kotte.

Numerous texts written by Catholic monks or priests introduce Sinhala, Tamil, and even Ceylonese Portuguese. It highlights the deep cultural interconnections established during Portuguese Ceylon, as shown in Figure 56.41.

The Portuguese period in Sri Lanka is a multifaceted chapter marked by military and political narratives and profound genetic, cultural, and social exchanges that have shaped the island's heritage in lasting ways.

Chapter 57

The Establishment of Uduwara in the Kingdom of Kotte by Antonio Carvalho de Silva

57.1 Uduwara: Echoes of the Douro and the Kalu Ganga

Once a formidable bastion in the defense of Kotte, Uduwara stands as a testament to the strategic military prowess of its era. Located on the banks of the Kalu Ganga River, as depicted in Figures 57.1, 57.2, and 57.3, Uduwara is situated in what is now the Kalutara District. Historically, it marked the border between the Kingdom of Kotte and the Sitawaka kingdom. This area, visible from the sea and surrounded by notable landmarks such as Deewalkanda and Adam's Peak, held immense strategic significance.

A solid, though incomplete, historical overview of Ceylon can be found in the work of M. G. Francis[2].

The construction of a fortress at Uduwara is well-documented in historical texts. For instance, O. M. da Silva Cosme's work, 'Fidalgos in the Kingdom of Kotte (Sri Lanka: 1505 - 1656),'[3] reveals that Antonio de Silva was responsible for its construction. This Antonio Carvalho de Silva, an ancestor of O. Shirani de Silva, died in December 1614, as recorded in the same text. Further details can be found in Chapter 61.3.

The name Uduwara likely predates the Portuguese arrival, though its etymology may reflect Greek or Portuguese influences. The Portuguese may have named it au Douro due to its resemblance to the Douro River in Portugal, highlighting similar geographical features between Kalutara's Kalu Ganga and Porto's Douro. The strategic importance of the region is underscored by historical battles, such as the 1595 conflict involving Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala.

During the Kotte period, Sinhalese social structures were distinct from European traditions. Honorable services were recognized with gifts like gold chains, swords, and land grants called 'Nindagam,' often documented on copper or palm leaves. High-born individuals received courtesy titles, and ceremonial honors were highly valued. The European influence introduced new dimensions to these practices, blending Sinhalese and Portuguese traditions.

The Portuguese incursion into Sri Lanka in the early 16th century aimed to control trade routes and resources, particularly spices. Early successes were facilitated by alliances with local rulers, but maintaining control proved challenging. Between 1560 and 1595, the Portuguese faced significant military and logistical difficulties. Despite constructing forts and strategic efforts by commanders like Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, internal betrayals and diseases hampered their progress.

King Dharmapala's reign (1551-1597) was heavily influenced by Portuguese support, which stabilized his rule but also created dependencies. Facing an heir crisis, Dharmapala bequeathed the Kingdom of Kotte to the Portuguese crown in 1580. Despite administrative challenges and Portuguese interference, his strategic foresight ensured the kingdom's Christian legacy, marking a significant shift in Sri Lanka's governance and religious landscape.

The late 16th century saw intensified Portuguese efforts to conquer Sri Lanka, notably the failed attempts to control Kandy (Candea). Key victories, such as installing a favorable king on Jaffna's throne, and strategic fortifications underscored their approach. However, continuous challenges like malaria outbreaks and local resistance complicated their efforts. This conquest period was marked by relentless military campaigns and strategic fortifications.

The Portuguese period in Kotte was characterized by political upheaval and conflict. Following the death of Rajasinghe I, Portuguese-backed leaders like Dom Joao Dharmapala Peria Bandara vied for control. Portuguese military campaigns, strategic alliances, and internal power struggles defined this era. Figures like Dom Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), described in Chapter 56.7, played pivotal roles in these conflicts.

Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's tenure (1594-1612) as Portuguese governor was marked by aggressive military campaigns and stringent administration. His efforts included fortifying key locations and integrating local rulers into the colonial system. Despite initial successes, internal betrayals and persistent resistance from local forces highlighted the complexities of maintaining colonial control.

The early Portuguese presence in Sri Lanka aimed to dominate the spice trade and establish control over key regions like Kotte. Initial alliances soon gave way to conflicts, exemplified by battles like Danture (1594). Local leaders such as Mudaliyar Dom Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) demonstrated significant influence, leveraging military successes to build resistance against Portuguese rule.

The late 16th century was marked by mutinies and internal conflicts within Portuguese ranks, exacerbated by figures like Domingos Correa. His temporary rise to power highlighted the volatile political landscape. The Portuguese, under leaders like Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), faced ongoing challenges in maintaining control, culminating in military confrontations and strategic fortifications.

Under Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's governance, Portuguese exploitation of resources and administrative abuses led to widespread discontent. Military efforts to suppress revolts, such as those led by Domingos Correa, were met with persistent local resistance. The Portuguese employed various strategies, including strategic retreats and resource destruction, to maintain their foothold.

Between 1596 and 1598, the Portuguese focused on fortifying their positions and capturing key rebels to stabilize their control. Despite military successes, they faced continuous pressure from Sinhalese forces. Efforts by leaders like Salvador Pereira de Silva exemplified the ongoing conflict and the complexities of pacifying the island.

The early 17th century saw strategic religious and political efforts by leaders like Wimala Dharma to restore Buddhist clergy and enhance political influence. The death of King Dharmapala in 1597 led to the consolidation of Portuguese control. The Sinhalese response varied, with some accepting Portuguese rule while others resisted, highlighting the complexities of colonial governance.

Following King Dharmapala's death, the Portuguese formalized control over Kotte through strategic fortifications and military engagements. Leaders like Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) played crucial roles in securing the region. Despite challenges, Portuguese efforts to establish control involved significant military and administrative strategies.

The late 16th century marked the decline of Portuguese control, characterized by internal betrayals and strategic fortifications. Key figures like Manuel Dias exemplified the treacherous dynamics. Portuguese efforts to maintain control faced persistent local resistance and strategic setbacks.

From 1594 to 1598, Portuguese colonial authorities engaged in resource exploitation and administrative abuses, leading to significant challenges. Efforts to curb exploitation and restore order were met with mixed success. The period highlighted the difficulties of maintaining effective colonial governance.

The establishment of Portuguese provinces (1597-1612) marked significant administrative and military efforts to consolidate control. Leaders like Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon),described in Chapter 56.7, played crucial roles in managing these territories. The period saw significant cultural and economic changes due to Portuguese colonization.

The year 1597 marked significant military and political changes following King Dharmapala's death. Portuguese efforts to consolidate control faced severe challenges, including internal conflicts and local resistance. Key military engagements highlighted the ongoing struggle for dominance.

In 1601, the Seven Korales region became a battleground for resistance against Portuguese rule. Local uprisings and Portuguese military responses highlighted the persistent conflict. Strategic military operations and internal challenges underscored the complexities of maintaining control.

The early 16th century marked the beginning of significant Portuguese-Sinhalese interactions. Initial peaceful trade relations soon gave way to military conflicts and resistance. Key figures and events during this period highlighted the complexities of colonial encounters and local resistance.

The Portuguese period (1505-1658) left a lasting legacy on Sri Lanka's cultural, religious, and socio-economic landscape. The introduction of Christianity, architectural influences, and new crops significantly impacted the island. Persistent resistance and strategic alliances underscored the resilience of the local population in the face of colonial dominance.

Before Portuguese arrival, Sri Lanka had a rich socio-political structure with prominent kingdoms like Kotte, Kandy, and Jaffna. The Portuguese arrival in 1505, initially marked by trade, soon led to ambitions for dominance, significantly altering local power dynamics. Their alliances and military strategies gradually eroded the autonomy of local kingdoms, particularly Kotte.

From 1610 to 1617, diplomatic and military engagements defined Portuguese efforts to consolidate control. Strategic alliances with the Dutch and local resistance highlighted the complexities of maintaining dominance. Persistent conflicts and internal strife within Kandy further complicated the political landscape. The period from 1638 to 1654 was marked by continuous Portuguese military efforts and local resistance. The Battle of Diagam in 1654 highlighted the intense struggle for control. Portuguese aggression and strategic maneuvers underscored their relentless pursuit of dominance.

The mid-17th century marked the decline of Portuguese power and the rise of Dutch influence. The Dutch, driven by commercial interests, formed alliances with local kingdoms like Kandy. The fall of Colombo in 1656 symbolized the end of Portuguese dominance and the beginning of Dutch control.

The Portuguese period in Sri Lanka (1505-1658) significantly influenced the island's cultural and socio-economic landscape. The introduction of Christianity, architectural styles, and new crops left a lasting legacy. The period is remembered for both its cultural contributions and the intense local resistance against colonial rule. The complex interactions between colonial powers and local populations during this era continue to shape the historical narrative of Sri Lanka.

57.2 Uduwara: A Confluence of Cultures

The locality of Uduwara likely bore its name long before the arrival of the Portuguese, although concrete evidence remains elusive, save for a potential link to the Greeks as elaborated in Chapter 52. The term 'Uduwara' might have resonated with the Portuguese as 'au Douro,' meaning 'at the Duro River.' The Douro River, known as Doura or Duero, is the most significant river in Portugal, flowing from Spain to Porto, originating in the Extremadura, the cradle of the de Silva family. The word Extremadura signifies 'at the extremity of the Duro River.' To the Greeks, this term could have implied a vantage point for observing the river, as discussed in Chapter 52.

In Kalutara, depicted in Figures 57.5, 57.6, 57.7, 57.8, and 57.2, at the mouth of the Kalu Ganga River—which flows through Uduwara—there remains a stretch of beach known as Cálido beach, shown in Figure 57.4. The term Cálido translates to 'hot' or 'warm' in Spanish, aptly describing the beach strip that offers no respite from the intense sun in Kalutara. A similar expanse of land exists at the mouth of the Douro River in Porto. However, storms and floods occasionally modify the landscape in Kalutara and its estuary. For instance, the appearance in 2021 differed significantly from that in 1985 or 2007.

There is little doubt that the Portuguese would have noticed the striking similarities between the Kalu Ganga's mouth and that of the Douro in Porto. It is plausible that they nicknamed the river after the Douro and perhaps named Uduwara in its honor. Further research is needed to substantiate this hypothesis, though an older Greek origin remains plausible, as illustrated in Chapter 52.

The renowned Battle of Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)) in 1595 at Uduwara took place on and around the rock known as 'Deewalkanda.' This rock lies behind the Kapuella temple, which once housed a Portuguese chapel (hence its name), approximately 800 meters from the Fortress of Uduwara and a few hundred meters from the cemetery where Shirani de Silva's parents are buried. The area is illustrated in Figures 57.9 and 57.10.

This historical tapestry, woven from Portuguese, Greek, and local threads, enriches the narrative of Uduwara, inviting further exploration and scholarly inquiry.

57.3 Honors, Hierarchies, and Social Dynamics in Sinhalese Society During the Kotte Period

In the study of the Sinhalese social structure during the Kotte period of Ceilao, it is evident that the system of honors and rewards diverged significantly from European traditions. Unlike European societies, which established orders of knighthood or formalized groups of notable men under a common emblem, the Sinhalese approach to recognizing service to the king or state was more individualistic. Distinguished service was rewarded with tokens such as gold chains, jewels, swords, and land assignments. These rewards were typically temporary, reverting to the crown upon the recipient's death unless explicitly designated as hereditary.

The land grants, known as 'Nindagam,' were particularly significant as they conferred both income and social status. These grants were meticulously documented on copper sheets or palm leaves, authenticated by the royal signature Sri. The falsification of such documents was a capital offense, underscoring their importance. The recipient, known as the Rala or Lord, governed the village, maintaining order and overseeing agricultural and economic activities.

In Sinhalese society, addressing high-born individuals by their given name was considered disrespectful. Courtesy titles were used, a practice noted by Robert Knox during his captivity in Ceilao. This respect for names extended to the conferral of honorific titles by the king, reflecting the individual's merits and achievements in various fields. The ceremonial bestowment of a golden thread through the hair by the king symbolized the highest honor. Lesser honors used cheaper materials and were presented by royal officers.

European influence introduced new dimensions to the system of titles and honors in Sinhalese society. The case of Edirille Arachchi's son, baptized as Domingos Correa, illustrates this blend of traditions. Initially known by his father's name and rank, Correa's military successes earned him the title of Mudaliyar. His valor against Wimala Dharma Surya's forces led to the honorific Wikramasinha (Blessed Lion), granted by Dharmapala. However, Correa's ambitions extended beyond these honors. He ultimately adopted the royal title Edirille Bandara, asserting his status in the presence of an army. This amalgamation of Sinhalese and Portuguese practices created a unique socio-political environment where traditional and colonial influences coexisted, shaping the identities and ambitions of local leaders.

The Rodi, often marginalized in historical narratives, played a significant role in the social fabric of Ceilao. P. E. Peiris describes them inaccurately as people of the dirt, a term reflecting his misunderstanding of their historical status. Originally part of the royal court, the Rodi were outcast after a conquest, placing them closer to the status of Roman slaves rather than a despised caste. Restricted from engaging in agriculture, carrying water, or entering places of worship, the Rodi lived in isolated hamlets, surviving through begging, prostitution, and theft. Despite their untouchable status, higher castes interacted with them, particularly in matters of prostitution, highlighting societal hypocrisy.

The Rodi's ostracism was severe; they were required to avoid public roads when others were present to prevent any chance of contact. Their shadows were believed to taint food, rendering it unfit for consumption. Their only permitted work was dealing with cattle carcasses, and from the hides, they made ropes. The tragic story of Pusella Mudaliyar's wife, condemned to join the Rodi and choosing to drown herself, illustrates the harsh realities faced by those cast out of mainstream society.

Peiris idealizes Sinhalese Buddhist courage, rooted in their belief in reincarnation. For Sinhalese Buddhists, death was merely a transition to another life, with the quality of the next life determined by one's karma. This belief system fostered a relative fearlessness towards death. The king held the exclusive power to impose the death penalty, but a fate worse than death was being rendered casteless. The caste system in Ceilao was less rigid than in other South Asian contexts, functioning more as tribal associations than strict hierarchies. The king could not elevate an individual to a higher caste, but he could ostracize them, stripping them of their caste identity. This punishment was considered more severe than death, emphasizing the importance of social belonging over individual status.

57.4 Military Campaigns and Political Intrigue: Portuguese Strategies in Kotte and Beyond

The Portuguese incursion into Sri Lanka in the early 16th century marked the beginning of a protracted period of conflict, cultural exchange, and political maneuvering that significantly shaped the island's history. The initial Portuguese expeditions were driven by the lucrative prospects of establishing trade relations, particularly for spices such as cinnamon and pepper. The island's strategic position along the maritime routes between Europe and Asia, coupled with its wealth in spices and other valuable commodities, rendered it a highly coveted territory for colonial powers.

The Portuguese commenced their conquest by seizing key coastal areas, erecting forts, and forging alliances with local rulers. These initial efforts laid the foundation for their expanding influence over the island. Their success was partially attributed to alliances with local chieftains and kings, though these alliances were often precarious and motivated by immediate benefits rather than enduring loyalty.

The period between 1560 and 1595 was marked by significant challenges for the Portuguese, particularly under the command of Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo. Despite his competence and determination, Azevedo's efforts were hampered by insufficient resources. His request for relief from the Viceroy was denied, compelling him to persevere with limited support. Key figures like Simao Pinhao played crucial roles in containing the enemy, though these efforts were insufficient for decisive victories. The return of Simao Correa, who had initially defected but later repented and was reintegrated into Portuguese ranks, revitalized military campaigns and led to frequent attacks and counter-attacks along the borders.

In 1599, the construction of a fort in Menikkadawara represented a strategic initiative to facilitate operations against Kandy. However, the Portuguese efforts were complicated by internal betrayals and shifting alliances. Pusella Mudaliyar's desertion to the Portuguese and his subsequent execution by Wimala Dharma's forces exemplified the volatile political landscape. Secret correspondence between Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo and Wimala Dharma highlights the intricate political maneuvers of the period. Wimala Dharma's proposal to support Simao Pinhao's claim to the lowlands in exchange for military cooperation, and the planned clandestine exchange of proxies and oaths of fidelity, underscore the ruthless tactics employed by both parties in their quest for power.

The Portuguese faced numerous obstacles in their attempts to advance to Kandy. The region of Maha Oya, notorious for its unhealthy conditions, posed significant health risks. An outbreak of malaria decimated the garrison at Etgalatota, overwhelming the hospital in Colombo with patients. Despite these setbacks, the Portuguese remained resolute in their goal to establish control over Kandy, viewing it as a critical strategic objective.

Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's leadership during this period was multifaceted, encompassing diplomacy, reconstruction, and military strategy. He successfully rebuilt previously destroyed areas and fortified key locations to secure Portuguese interests. His strategic acumen was demonstrated through the appointment of commanders to control various territories and the construction of garrisons and securing of rivers to maintain supply lines and transportation routes. The construction of a wooden fence at Ruanwella and a fortress at Uduwara, along with the reinforcement of Galle fort initially built in 1589, exemplify his focus on securing vital waterways and controlling the surrounding Korale.

The execution of Domingos Corea, also known as Edirille Rala, in 1595, marked a significant event in the Portuguese consolidation of power. Captured and interrogated by Dom Jerónimo, Corea remained unyielding even after a 40-day postponement, leading to his public execution on July 14, 1595. Conducted with elaborate ceremonies befitting Corea's rank, the execution was intended as a deterrent to others who might consider betraying the Portuguese. Corea's calm demeanor during the interrogation and execution underscored the complex interplay of honor, loyalty, and resistance that characterized this turbulent period in Sri Lanka's history.

The Portuguese era in Sri Lanka was thus defined by a series of military challenges, strategic alliances, and political maneuvers, all of which played crucial roles in the broader context of colonial ambitions and local resistance. The enduring impact of this period is evident in the historical, cultural, and socio-political fabric of Sri Lanka.

57.5 King Dharmapala's Strategic Alliance and the Donation of Kotte to Portugal

King Dharmapala's ascension to the throne of Kotte in 1551 occurred during a tumultuous period marked by both internal dissension and external threats. His reign was pivotal as he sought to consolidate his power amidst the complexities introduced by Portuguese influence, which had begun to take root in Sri Lanka in the early 16th century. The strategic alliance with the Portuguese provided Dharmapala with much-needed military and political support, stabilizing his reign but also creating new dependencies and dynamics that would shape the kingdom's future.

By the late 1570s, King Dharmapala faced a critical issue: the absence of an heir. This personal dilemma was compounded by broader political and religious considerations. Educated by Franciscan missionaries and a devout Christian, Dharmapala believed that only the Portuguese could secure the continuation of his Christian legacy on the throne. His gratitude for their support and disdain for local factions that had rebelled against him further motivated his decision to donate the Kingdom of Kotte to the Portuguese crown.

On August 12, 1580, Dharmapala formally arranged to transfer the kingdom to Dom Henrique of Portugal and his heirs, an arrangement accepted by the capitao of Colombo, Manoel de Souza Coutinho. This donation was not an act of desperation but a strategic move to ensure the kingdom's future under Christian rule. The death of Dom Henrique in 1583 necessitated an adjustment, and on November 4, 1583, the donation was restructured in favor of King Felipe of Portugal and Spain and his successors. This act was publicly ratified, securing the transfer of power upon Dharmapala's death, barring the birth of any heirs.

Throughout his reign, King Dharmapala faced significant challenges in maintaining control over the kingdom's financial resources. He protested against external interference with his treasury, insisting that trade proceeds be securely managed under strict supervision. His administrative challenges were compounded by Portuguese officials who often acted autonomously, undermining his authority. In response, Dharmapala proposed establishing a select cabinet comprising a Sinhalese representative, a Portuguese appointee by the King of Portugal, and a Franciscan, aiming to balance power and ensure the execution of his orders.

Dharmapala's appeals to King Felipe II of Spain (also King Philip I of Portugal) were persistent, seeking protection against the abuses and exploitation by Portuguese officials in Sri Lanka. He requested the appointment of a trustworthy Portuguese secretary and capitao as his guardians, individuals independent of the local Portuguese authorities in Colombo. These measures were intended to protect his interests and maintain his sovereignty amidst the growing influence of Portuguese settlers and their aggressive proselytizing efforts, which created significant friction within the kingdom.

Despite the numerous challenges and opposition he faced, King Dharmapala's reign was marked by his strategic foresight and determination to secure his legacy. The donation of the Kotte Kingdom to the Portuguese, while controversial, was a calculated move to ensure the continuity of Christian rule and reflect his profound gratitude and strategic acumen. Dharmapala's reign left an indelible mark on the history of Sri Lanka, demonstrating a complex interplay of personal, political, and religious factors that shaped the kingdom's trajectory during a critical period.

57.6 From Conquest to Control: Portuguese Expansion in Ceilao

In the late 16th century, the Portuguese embarked on an ambitious endeavor to conquer Ceilao, now known as Sri Lanka. Under directives from Lisbon and Madrid, their primary objectives were to establish dominance over the island and convert local rulers to Christianity, thereby facilitating easier control. This marked the beginning of a series of expeditions characterized by both military engagement and strategic alliances.

The Portuguese initially attempted to control the Kingdom of Kandy in 1591 by installing a Christian client, D. Filipe Yamasinha, on the throne. This attempt, however, proved unsuccessful, reflecting the challenges the Portuguese faced in exerting influence through local proxies rather than direct rule. Despite this setback, the Portuguese achieved a significant victory in Jaffna the same year. André Furtado de Mendonça successfully placed Ethirimanna Cinkam, a king favorable to the Portuguese, on the throne, thus securing their influence in the northern part of the island.

The political landscape of Ceilao underwent a significant transformation in 1593 with the death of King Rajasinha I of Sitawaka. As a principal adversary of Kotte, his death removed a major obstacle to Portuguese expansion. Consequently, the Portuguese launched new military campaigns to consolidate their power. In 1594, Pero Lopes de Sousa led an expedition to conquer Kandy and install Dona Catarina Kusumasanadevi, sister of D. Filipe Yamasinha, on the throne. This campaign culminated in the disastrous Battle of Danture, reinforcing the position of Vimaladharmasuriya, the Buddhist King of Kandy, who subsequently married Dona Catherine.

Between 1594 and 1612, Dom Jeronimo de Azevedo served as the general commander in Ceilao, overseeing extensive efforts to establish and secure Portuguese control. This period saw the construction of numerous fortifications, including key fortresses in Ruwanwella, Galle, and Uduwara, designed to maintain control and block access to hostile regions, particularly Kandy. By 1597, strongholds were established in various strategic locations, marking a robust network of Portuguese fortifications across the island.

The death of King Dom Joao in 1597 led to the formal integration of the Kingdom of Kotte into the Catholic Monarchy of H.M. Felipe II. This political shift spurred further Portuguese efforts to reclaim lost territories and conquer additional kingdoms. Following the conquest of the Four and Seven Corales, additional fortifications were constructed in strategic locations, further stabilizing the newly conquered territories and impeding access to Kandy.

During this period, a significant administrative effort was undertaken to inventory the lands of Kotte. The first register, compiled in 1599, documented the ownership of farms, reflecting the Portuguese endeavor to systematically manage and control the agricultural resources of the island. This process continued until 1614-1617, marking a critical step in consolidating Portuguese administrative control.

The Portuguese conquest of Ceilao must be viewed within the broader context of their colonial ambitions in Asia. Driven by the goals of expanding their empire, controlling lucrative trade routes, and spreading Christianity, the Portuguese employed both military and diplomatic means to exert their influence over Ceilao. Their period of rule left a lasting legacy, characterized by the introduction of Christianity, the establishment of fortifications, and significant cultural exchanges. Despite their eventual decline, the Portuguese impact on the island's history is undeniable, influencing subsequent colonial and local rulers.

The transition from Portuguese to Dutch rule in the mid-17th century was shaped by the foundations laid during the Portuguese period. The fortifications and administrative systems established by the Portuguese were adapted and expanded by the Dutch, continuing the legacy of European colonial influence on the island. Thus, the Portuguese conquest of Ceilao stands as a pivotal chapter in the island's history, offering rich insights into the dynamics of early colonial ambitions and their enduring effects on Sri Lanka's historical trajectory.

57.7 Conflict and Diplomacy: The Portuguese and the Kingdom of Kotte

The early interactions between the Portuguese and the Kingdom of Kotte initiated a period of significant political upheaval and conflict, deeply influencing the island's historical trajectory. Rajasinghe I, also known as Tikiri Bandara, emerged as a pivotal figure during this era, his rule extending over Sitawaka, Raigama, and Kandy. The death of Rajasinghe I in 1592 marked a crucial turning point, precipitating a succession crisis that was a frequent occurrence in Sri Lankan monarchies.

In the wake of Rajasinghe I's demise, Dom Joao Dharmapala Peria Bandara of Kotte, with substantial Portuguese backing, positioned himself to seize power. This period was characterized by intricate power struggles and shifting allegiances. Historian O. M. da Silva Cosme details the instrumental role the Portuguese played in shaping the political landscape of Sri Lanka during these formative years.

The Portuguese, intent on consolidating their influence, saw the capitao of Colombo, Pedro Homem Pereyra, dispatch a reconnaissance squadron under Dom Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, also known as 'Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon),' into Alutkuru Korale. This squadron, consisting of 400 lascarins, aimed to assess the political atmosphere and secure allegiances. Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)'s efforts bore fruit as he persuaded two influential Mudaliyars, Panniki and Kuruppu, to support Dharmapala.

Simultaneously, the ascension of Nikapitiya Bandara to the throne of Sitawaka further complicated the political dynamics. Skirmishes ensued, with Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) securing victories at Orutota and Alutkuru Korale. However, the Sitawaka army, led by Aritta Kivendu Perumal, successfully repelled the combined force of lascarins and Portuguese. Notable casualties included Wickramasinghe, also known as Diogo de Silva, while the Portuguese commander Francisco de Silva Castelhano narrowly escaped. Perumal's ambitions grew, leading him to propose marriage to the young King of Sitawaka's sister, which incited internal friction within the royal family. Sensing the danger, Perumal retreated to Negombo, aiming to capture it from the Kotte army.

Despite setbacks, Aritta Kivendu Perumal remained ambitious, seeking to become the new King of Sitawaka through an alliance with the Portuguese. He kidnapped Francisco de Silva Castelhano under the guise of a hunting expedition and used him as leverage to negotiate with the Portuguese, proposing their assistance in conquering Sitawaka in exchange for Castelhano's release. Pereyra agreed to this plan, formally recognizing Perumal as the new King of Sitawaka, bestowing upon him the royal name Jayavira Bandara.

This alliance faced immediate challenges as an opposing Sitawaka army attacked, forcing King Jayavira Bandara to seek refuge in Colombo on September 1, 1593. Desperate, Jayavira Bandara pledged total allegiance to Dharmapala of Kotte, vowing to support Kotte in reclaiming its territories and conquering Sitawaka. This commitment catalyzed a concerted military effort, culminating in the reconquest of Sitawaka by the end of 1593, marking a significant triumph for Portuguese Ceilao.

The Portuguese period in the Kingdom of Kotte was thus marked by complex power struggles and strategic alliances. The death of Rajasinghe I triggered a series of events that reshaped Sri Lanka's political landscape. Through a combination of military prowess and diplomatic maneuvering, the Portuguese significantly influenced these transformations. Key figures such as Dom Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, Aritta Kivendu Perumal, and Dom Joao Dharmapala Peria Bandara played central roles, each striving for dominance in this tumultuous era. This narrative underscores the intricate dynamics of succession and power during the Portuguese period in Sri Lanka, offering a detailed examination of the significant developments that defined this chapter in the island's history.

57.8 Dominion and Dissent: Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's Governance in Sri Lanka

The Portuguese presence in Sri Lanka during the late 16th and early 17th centuries marks a significant period of military, political, and cultural interactions, epitomized by the leadership of Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo. His tenure, spanning eighteen years from December 1594, when he arrived in Colombo to replace Pero Lopes de Sousa as the Portuguese governor, was characterized by aggressive military campaigns and stringent administrative measures that deeply influenced the trajectory of Sri Lankan history.

Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's arrival in Colombo marked the beginning of a new chapter in the Portuguese strategy on the island. Immediately after his arrival, Azevedo launched a campaign towards Sitawaka, a city that had once been the capital of King Raja Sinha I but was now desolate. This campaign was not merely a military maneuver but also a symbolic act of retribution and consolidation. The partially restored city was intended to host King Dharmapala, who accompanied the Portuguese forces. This set the tone for Azevedo's rule, characterized by severe retribution and calculated strategies to consolidate Portuguese power. Notably, Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), a key local figure, was redirected from fort-building in Galle to lead operations against the resistance led by Wimala Dharma, although his success was limited.

In consolidating Portuguese control, Azevedo's administration was marked by significant events such as the capture of the young king Nikapitiya Bandara, who was baptized as Dom Felipe and sent to Goa for education. This strategy of integrating local rulers into the Portuguese colonial framework exemplified the broader effort to establish dominance over the island. Additionally, the Portuguese reinforced their presence through fortifications and by requesting additional troops. For instance, recognizing the threat posed by King Wimala Dharmasuriya of Kandy, Colombo's capitao sought reinforcements from Goa. Key figures like Antonio Carvalho de Silva and other Portuguese settlers were instrumental in these efforts, particularly in the construction of a fortress at Uduwara around 1600.

The Battle of Danture stands out as a pivotal event during Azevedo's tenure. In early 1594, a significant military reinforcement led by Pero Lopez de Souza arrived from Goa, bolstering the Portuguese forces with 1200 seasoned soldiers and fidalgos. This force aimed to subdue King Wimala Dharmasuriya and was supported by local allies, including Jayavira (formerly Aritta Kivendu Perumal) and his 15000-strong army. Despite initial advancements through challenging terrain and adverse weather, the Portuguese campaign faced critical setbacks. Internal betrayals and the desertion of mercenary forces, exacerbated by the monsoon rains, severely hampered their progress.

A decisive turning point occurred when Wimala Dharmasuriya offered the crowns of Kotte and Sitawaka to Jayavira, disrupting Portuguese plans. The discovery of Jayavira's betrayal led to his execution by Portuguese soldiers, resulting in the disintegration of their allied forces and leaving the Portuguese militarily vulnerable. This betrayal significantly weakened their position and exemplified the complex interplay of local politics and colonial ambitions.

Azevedo's rule left a profound impact on Sri Lanka, marked by both temporary control and significant resistance. His military policies and stringent administration sowed fear and established a fragile dominance. The Portuguese presence during his leadership brought about notable cultural and social changes, including the spread of Christianity and the introduction of European administrative practices. The integration of local rulers into the colonial system and the construction of fortifications had lasting effects on Sri Lankan society.

Historians, including P.E. Peiris, provide critical insights into this era, highlighting both the accomplishments and the brutal methods employed by the Portuguese. The period of Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's leadership remains a complex chapter in Sri Lankan history, reflecting the broader dynamics of colonial expansion and indigenous resistance.

In conclusion, Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's tenure as the Portuguese governor in Sri Lanka was characterized by aggressive expansion, consolidation, and conflict. His military campaigns, administrative strategies, and significant events such as the Battle of Danture shaped the Portuguese influence on the island. This examination of his leadership offers a nuanced understanding of the complexities of colonial rule and its enduring legacies in Sri Lankan history.

57.9 From Invasion to Resistance: The Portuguese Campaigns in Sri Lanka

The Portuguese first set foot in Sri Lanka in the early 16th century, driven by the allure of controlling the lucrative spice trade. Their arrival marked the beginning of a complex period of interaction, conflict, and cultural exchange that would shape the island's history for centuries. The Kingdom of Kotte, due to its strategic location and political significance, became a central focus for the Portuguese. Initially, they forged alliances with local rulers, but tensions soon escalated as their ambitions grew.

A pivotal event in this period was the Battle of Danture on October 5, 1594. Faced with dwindling support, de Souza marched with 300 loyal lascarins towards Gannoruwa to secure provisions. However, a detachment of 150 Portuguese and lascarins sent to Halloluwa encountered unexpected resistance, leading to the infamous confrontation at Danture. This battle, also known as the Battle of Gannoruwa, is remembered for its political implications rather than its military tactics. Outnumbered and ill-equipped, the Portuguese forces, led by de Souza, succumbed to the larger Kandyan army, resulting in a decisive defeat and the capture of de Souza and his son.

Following the Portuguese defeat, Wimala Dharmasuriya's strategic marriage to Queen Dona Catherina, after hijacking her at Balana (see also Chapter 56), marked a pivotal shift in power. This union established a new dynasty and centralized resistance against Portuguese dominance in Senkadagala. The defeat at Danture sparked widespread revolts across Sri Lanka, revealing the underlying dissatisfaction with European interference. The retreat of Portuguese forces to Colombo and the subsequent reorganization under new commanders indicated the beginning of a prolonged struggle for control.

Local leaders played a crucial role during this period. Mudaliyar Dom Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) demonstrated significant influence and agency in the resistance against Portuguese rule through his discovery of Rajasinghe's treasure and strategic maneuvers. Similarly, Domingos Correa leveraged the recovered treasures to build a formidable lascarin army, rising to power as Wickramasinghe. These figures underscored the shifting power dynamics and the importance of local alliances in the broader context of resistance.

The broader implications of the Portuguese defeat at Danture are profound. Had the Portuguese succeeded, Sri Lanka's history might have been markedly different, potentially precluding Dutch and British colonization. The immediate aftermath of the Portuguese defeat saw a temporary calm, attributed to the population's satisfaction with the existing power balance. However, subsequent revolts financed by stolen treasures and led by figures like Akaragama Appuhamy highlighted ongoing instability and the complex interplay of local and foreign interests.

In response to the crisis, Don Jeronimo de Azevedo arrived in Colombo, shown in Figure 57.11, on Christmas Eve, 1594, with substantial reinforcements, marking the beginning of a new phase in the Portuguese campaign in Sri Lanka. His experience as capitao-major of the Malabar coast brought renewed vigor to the beleaguered Portuguese forces. The arrival of Azevedo and the reorganization of Portuguese forces signaled a continued commitment to maintaining their foothold in Sri Lanka. The ensuing years saw further conflicts and shifting alliances as both local and foreign powers vied for control of the island.

The Portuguese period in Sri Lanka was marked by a series of conflicts, strategic marriages, and shifting alliances that left a lasting impact on the island's history. The complex interplay of local resistance and foreign ambition during this time set the stage for the subsequent phases of colonial influence, shaping the cultural and political landscape of Sri Lanka for generations to come. The narrative of the Portuguese period in Sri Lanka provides insights into the intricate dynamics that characterized this era, illustrating the profound and lasting effects of early European colonial endeavors on the island's history.

57.10 The Rise and Fall of Domingos Correa: Political Intrigue and Military Struggle in Late 16th Century Sri Lanka

During the late 16th century, Sri Lanka's history was profoundly shaped by internal conflicts and political maneuvering, particularly involving the Portuguese colonial forces and local leaders. The Portuguese presence on the island was characterized by strife and power struggles, which were intensified by mutinies among their soldiers and the emergence of key local figures such as Domingos Correa. This narrative explores the tumultuous period marked by Correa's rise, his subsequent coup, and eventual downfall, providing a detailed examination of the political and military dynamics that defined this era.

In 1595, the Portuguese forces in Sri Lanka were beset by mutinies, creating a challenging environment for Commander Azevedo, who struggled to maintain discipline. The mutinies stemmed from a combination of dissatisfaction with leadership, harsh conditions, and conflicts over resources and authority. To quell the unrest, Azevedo enlisted the help of Domingos Correa and the lascarins, local soldiers allied with the Portuguese. This decision, while effective in restoring order, further alienated Azevedo from his men, as the reliance on local forces exacerbated existing tensions within the Portuguese ranks.

Domingos Correa's military prowess became evident during his campaign in the strategically vital region of the Four Korales, where he successfully captured a significant portion of the Prince of Uva's army. This victory not only showcased Correa's capabilities as a commander but also elevated his status among both the local populace and the Portuguese. Correa's ability to navigate the complex political landscape, balancing his loyalty to the Portuguese with his ambitions, positioned him as a formidable leader and set the stage for his dramatic rise to power.

The political landscape of Sri Lanka was dramatically altered on November 17, 1595, when Correa declared himself King at Atulugama, near the Portuguese fortress of Menikkadawara. This bold coup d'état challenged the existing power structures and triggered a series of military confrontations. In the aftermath, Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, known as Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), emerged as a crucial figure in responding to Correa's declaration. A staunch pro-Portuguese leader with deep familial and social ties to the Portuguese, Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) played a pivotal role in safeguarding Portuguese interests and protecting King Dharmapala and his Queen from Correa's advancing forces.

Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) led the efforts to evacuate the royals and consolidate Portuguese power, which involved a strategic retreat from Menikkadawara and Ruanwella to Sitawaka and eventually to Colombo. The evacuation was fraught with challenges, including blocked roads and fierce fighting. However, with the support of local allies like Appuhamy from the Rayigam Korale, the evacuation was successfully executed. The situation reached a critical point at Horana, where timely reinforcements led by Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)'s brother, Diego Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), repelled Correa's forces, ensuring the royals' safety. To prevent further incursions, a fortress was constructed near the rock at Deewalkanda, in Chapter 56, by Antonio Carvalho de Silva, playing a key role in securing the area.

The Royals were therefore saved at Uduwara. Correa's armies were stopped there, and on their route more back to Colombo, further help would be offered by Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) along the road from Uduwara to Colombo. This road may have passed by Wadduwa in Figure 57.13, depending on the road system at that time.

Despite his initial successes, Correa's fortunes began to wane as he faced significant defeats in subsequent military engagements. His forces suffered losses at Beligal Korale and Udugama, losing valuable resources and further weakening his position. The capture of Correa's brother Simao marked a turning point, forcing Correa to retreat to Senkadagala. His downfall was ultimately sealed by his betrayal by a local woman, leading to his capture by Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon). Correa was taken to Colombo and executed on July 14, 1596, marking the end of his tumultuous reign and the restoration of Portuguese control.

Correa's execution did not fully resolve the mysteries of his reign, particularly the locations of hidden treasures looted from churches. Nonetheless, Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) emerged as a celebrated hero, recognized for his role in capturing Correa and restoring order. His efforts solidified his status as a key military and political figure in the region, illustrating the intricate and often violent interplay of local and colonial forces in shaping Sri Lanka's history during this period.

57.11 Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's Governance: Exploitation, Rebellion, and Retreat

The period of Portuguese rule in Sri Lanka, particularly under the governance of Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo from 1594 to 1612, was characterized by profound exploitation and systemic corruption, which significantly impacted the local economy and exacerbated tensions between the Portuguese and the Sinhalese.

Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, alongside his capitao, Tomé de Sousa de Arronches, exerted tight control over the local economy by appointing their allies to critical positions such as factors and escrivaes or scribes. This manipulation ensured that the considerable revenues, estimated to be around 900000 cruzados annually, were siphoned off for personal enrichment rather than supporting the kingdom's public or military expenses. Azevedo and his associates monopolized the areca nut trade, a lucrative sector that could rival the import duties in revenue, channeling its profits exclusively to a handful of Portuguese officials. This economic exploitation diverted funds from essential public services, leading to widespread discontent and destabilization among the local populace.

The local Sinhalese population, who initially saw potential cooperation with the Portuguese, found themselves increasingly marginalized and oppressed due to the administration's corruption. The diversion of resources intended for public and military use, coupled with the brutal enforcement methods employed by Azevedo and his men, intensified grievances and set the stage for continued conflicts and revolts.

The period from 1595 to 1596 witnessed significant revolts, notably led by Domingos Correa. Correa's initial success against the Prince of Uva provided a fleeting victory for the Portuguese, but in November 1595, with support from Wimala Dharma Surya, Correa rebelled against Dharmapala, crowning himself King of Sitawaka. This insurrection forced Dharmapala and the Portuguese army to retreat to Colombo, revealing the fragile nature of Portuguese control over the island.

In response to these revolts, the Portuguese employed various military strategies to reassert their dominance. Salvador Pereira de Silva orchestrated a successful night attack on the enemy camp near Kuruvita, resulting in substantial enemy casualties and the capture of prisoners and loot. Despite this tactical victory, it was insufficient to quell the widespread unrest. The Portuguese forces, though outnumbered, utilized superior military tactics and fortified positions to fend off the Sinhalese forces. Nevertheless, the ongoing skirmishes and the persistent threat of renewed revolts underscored the precariousness of their rule.

From 1595 to 1597, the Portuguese faced mounting difficulties in defending their territories, necessitating strategic retreats and resource destruction to impede enemy advances. Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo ordered the evacuation of key strongholds such as Menikkadawara and Ruwanwella, relocating garrisons to more defensible positions in Sitawaka and ultimately Colombo. The retreating forces blocked roads with trees and barricades, creating obstacles for both Portuguese and Sinhalese forces alike. In a bid to deny resources to the enemy, the Portuguese destroyed food supplies and left behind booby traps, including poisoned candied fruits and casks of gunpowder. However, the effectiveness of these traps remains debatable among historians.

As the Portuguese forces retreated, they were incessantly harassed by the Sinhalese. The journey towards Gurubewila was particularly grueling, with repeated attacks leading to significant Portuguese losses, including the deaths of 23 soldiers from their already depleted ranks. The use of war elephants by Sinhalese forces added to the ferocity of the assaults.

These strategic retreats and resource destruction efforts were desperate measures aimed at preserving the Portuguese strongholds in Galle and Colombo. However, they also highlighted the tenuous nature of Portuguese control over Sri Lanka and the enduring resistance of the Sinhalese, who remained a formidable adversary throughout this tumultuous period.

57.12 Pacification and Power: The Portuguese Military Strategy in Sri Lanka's Turbulent Era

In the late 16th century, the Portuguese colonial endeavors in Sri Lanka were marked by persistent efforts to pacify and control the island amidst widespread turmoil and local revolts. The period between 1596 and 1598 was particularly significant as the Portuguese implemented a series of strategies to consolidate their dominance and counter the resistance from the indigenous Sinhalese forces.

To secure their foothold on the island, the Portuguese undertook strategic fortifications, especially near the borders of the Kandyan Kingdom. These fortifications were bolstered by mixed garrisons comprising Portuguese soldiers and lascarins, aimed at preventing incursions by Sinhalese forces and stabilizing Portuguese-controlled territories. Key military figures were appointed to oversee these efforts: Salvador Pereyra de Silva was named capitao-major of the army by de Acevedo, Gaspar Correa established camps on the frontiers, Fernando Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) was responsible for Matara in the south, and Lourenço Perez de Carvalho managed military operations in Galle.

The Portuguese efforts to pacify the island also involved the capture and punishment of key rebels. Among these was Simao Correa, who had fled to Kandy and taken the name Navaratne Bandara, continuing to pose a significant threat to Portuguese rule until his eventual capture by Pereyra de Silva. Diogo Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), the ambitious younger brother of Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, faced imprisonment twice but was repeatedly pardoned by de Acevedo. To neutralize his disruptive potential, de Acevedo eventually decided to send him to Portugal via Goa.

The conflict persisted through 1596 and 1597, characterized by significant military engagements and the fluctuating fortunes of various leaders. In the summer of 1596, Wimala Dharma launched another campaign, supported by the King of Uva and Simao Correa. This campaign aimed to challenge Portuguese control by targeting strategic regions like Matara. The Sinhalese forces, including a formidable number of musketeers and armed elephants, advanced on the Portuguese fortress of Corvite (Kuruvita).

Despite being heavily outnumbered, the Portuguese under the command of Salvador Pereira de Silva managed a successful defense. A bold night raid on the Sinhalese camp inflicted significant casualties on the enemy, providing a temporary respite for the Portuguese. However, these successes did not ease the continuous pressure from Sinhalese forces. Strategic retreats and resource destruction were necessary to hinder the enemy's advance but also underscored the precariousness of the Portuguese position.

The ongoing skirmishes and the looming threat of renewed revolts highlighted the formidable challenges faced by the Portuguese in maintaining their control over Sri Lanka. The period was marked by relentless conflict, strategic fortifications, and the complex dynamics of colonial military leadership, underscoring the turbulent nature of Portuguese efforts to pacify the island.

57.13 Portuguese Ascendancy and the Restoration of Buddhism in Kotte

The political and religious landscape of Sri Lanka at the turn of the 16th century was marked by significant maneuvering, both by local rulers and colonial powers. A key figure in this era was Wimala Dharma, whose strategies in 1597 were crucial in both restoring the Buddhist clergy and solidifying his political position. His initiatives were primarily driven by the need to address the grievances resulting from Raja Sinha's previously hostile attitude towards the Buddhist clergy. To restore the priestly succession, Wimala Dharma dispatched an ambassador to Myanmar (then known as Pegu), successfully bringing back priests to Sri Lanka.[4] This culminated in a solemn ordination near the capital, which marked a significant step in re-establishing the religious order.

In addition to religious restoration, Wimala Dharma enhanced his spiritual and political influence by installing the sacred tooth relic (Danta Dhatu), a potent symbol of Buddhist legitimacy, at Senkadagala. This relic was housed in a three-story building adorned with gold and precious stones, underscoring its significance. Wimala Dharma's pilgrimage to venerate the Footstep on Samanala Kanda (Adam's Peak, shown in Figures 57.14) and the installation of a replica of this Footstep near his palace further bolstered his standing among his subjects, intertwining his religious devotion with political authority.

The year 1597 also marked a pivotal transition of power with the death of King Dharmapala. His demise on May 27 led to the Portuguese consolidating their control over the Kingdom of Kotte, acting on behalf of the King of Portugal. This transition was formalized through oaths of allegiance from key figures, including Thomé de Souza d' Arronches, Dom Antao, Dom Constantino, and Dom Jorge. Thus, the distant King of Portugal was officially recognized as the King of Kotte, a significant shift in the island's governance.

Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo emerged as a prominent authority figure, effectively overseeing the Portuguese administration in Sri Lanka. Known as the King of Malwana, Azevedo's power was reinforced through various measures, including tax collection and the establishment of a strong military presence. His leadership played a crucial role in consolidating Portuguese authority on the island.

The Sinhalese response to this new governance structure between 1597 and 1612 varied. While many accepted Portuguese rule, focusing on the immediate local representatives rather than the distant King of Portugal, there were instances of resistance. Local leaders, recognizing the benefits of aligning with the Portuguese, often cooperated with the colonial authorities to secure their positions. This pragmatic approach enabled them to navigate the new power dynamics and ensure their survival in a rapidly changing political environment.

The Portuguese period in Sri Lanka was thus characterized by intense conflicts, political maneuvering, and significant shifts in governance. The era witnessed the rise and fall of leaders like Domingos Correa and strategic efforts by the Portuguese to maintain control over the island. Through a combination of military strength and strategic alliances, the Portuguese established a lasting presence in Sri Lanka, profoundly shaping its history. The internal conflicts, revolts, and political strategies of this period provide a comprehensive understanding of the challenges faced by both the Portuguese colonizers and the Sinhalese, highlighting the complex and tumultuous nature of this era.

57.14 Conquest and Consolidation: Portuguese Fortifications and Battles in Kotte (1597-1600)

The year 1597 marked a significant turning point in the history of the Kingdom of Kotte, initiated by the death of King Dharmapala. His passing not only ended a monarch's reign but also triggered a major political transition. Dharmapala, having no heirs, had bequeathed his kingdom to the Crown of Portugal, a decision influenced by his conversion to Christianity and close ties with the Portuguese. This act set the stage for a new era of direct Portuguese rule in Sri Lanka, then known as Ceilao.

[4] Interestingly, DNA research on Sri Lankans and an investigation of family names revealed that several families have ancestors in Myanmar.

The formal transition to Portuguese rule was solidified through the convention at Malwana on September 29, 1597. This event was crucial, as Portuguese authorities gathered to officially transfer the Kingdom of Kotte to the Crown of Portugal. Representatives from various Korales (districts) participated in the event, which took place in the scenic village of Malwana by the Kelani Ganga River. They negotiated the terms of allegiance, emphasizing the importance of Portuguese officials respecting and upholding Sinhalese laws and customs. The oath-taking ceremony was symbolic, with eight predominantly Christian representatives swearing loyalty to King Felipe II of Portugal. This ceremony, marked by the carrying of the Royal Standard of Portugal through the main streets by Dom Antao, signaled the commencement of Portuguese governance and cultural influence in Kotte.

The period following the transition was marked by significant military engagements and fortification efforts. Salvador Pereira de Silva, the capitao major, oversaw the kingdom's defense against external threats from neighboring kingdoms. A prominent figure during this period was Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, also known as Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), whose military acumen and leadership earned him a knighthood in the prestigious Order of Christ, making him the first non-European to receive this honor. His mixed Iberian and Sinhalese heritage symbolized the cultural fusion of this era.

To protect Kotte, the Portuguese undertook extensive fortification efforts, fortifying key locations such as Alawwa in the Seven Korales. Commanders like Simao Correa led these efforts, creating a defensive network capable of withstanding assaults from the Kingdom of Kandy. Reinforcements from Goa bolstered the Portuguese military presence, enabling them to open new frontlines on the Uva frontier and stabilize the region.

However, internal power struggles added another layer of complexity to this period. Domingos Correa and Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) were involved in a conflict that culminated in the decisive battle at Uduwara on September 25, where Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)'s forces achieved a brilliant victory. This triumph solidified Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)'s reputation and earned him further honors, including a substantial land grant. Despite Correa's strategic maneuvers and simultaneous attacks from multiple directions, the Portuguese, under commanders like Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) and Simao Pinhao, managed to repel these assaults and maintain their hold over Kotte.

Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala ('Samarakoon') had acquired a reputation for his hostilities against the King of Jaffna in 1591. The physical description given by Peris is significant in the context of the archaeological findings at Uduwara, shown in Figure 61.23 on page 1170: He was 35 years old, had a sturdy body and was very strong. He had a large round head, and he was blind in one eye. He enjoyed such prestige that he was found worthy of being rewarded by Dona Maria Pereira's hand, Raja Sinha's granddaughter, and he had succeeded Edirille Rala as commander of the lascarins.

King Wimala Dharma of Kandy played a central role in resisting Portuguese rule, organizing several army groups to launch coordinated attacks on Portuguese positions. His strategy involved using the rugged terrain to his advantage and conducting guerrilla warfare to disrupt Portuguese control. In response, the Portuguese, under Governor Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, prioritized the construction of strong forts in strategic locations, such as Manicaware and Saffragam, to serve as bases for operations against Kandy. Despite facing supply shortages and logistical challenges, Portuguese troops managed to launch successful counterattacks, destroying rebel-held cities, conquering fortresses, and subduing rebellious Korales. Dom Jerónimo's efforts culminated in a decisive victory on the borders of Kandy, further consolidating Portuguese control over the region.

Maintaining Portuguese control over Ceilao required a substantial military presence and effective logistical support. An army of 20000 men, including 1000 Europeans, was stationed in garrisons across the kingdom and at strategic coastal points to guard against both internal and external threats. Despite numerous challenges, including logistical difficulties, local resistance, and occasional internal dissent, the Portuguese demonstrated remarkable resilience. Through strategic fortifications, effective military leadership, and tactical responses to threats, they managed to establish and maintain their rule over the Kingdom of Kotte during this tumultuous period.

In conclusion, the period of Portuguese rule in Kotte from 1597 to 1600 was marked by significant military engagements, strategic fortifications, and the complex interplay of local and colonial powers. The transition to Portuguese rule, defense against external threats, and internal power struggles all contributed to shaping the historical landscape of Sri Lanka during this era. The resilience and adaptability of both the Portuguese and the local Sinhalese were crucial in navigating the challenges of this transformative period.

57.15 Betrayal and Fortification: The Tumultuous Decline of Portuguese Control in Sri Lanka

The decline of Portuguese control in Sri Lanka during the late 16th century is a compelling illustration of the complex interplay between colonial forces and local resistance, marked by betrayal, strategic maneuvering, and intermittent victories. A significant narrative in this period revolves around the figure of Manuel Dias, whose story encapsulates the treacherous dynamics of the era.

Manuel Dias's journey began as a member of the Portuguese army under Pere Lopes de Sousa. Captured by the Sinhalese following Sousa's defeat, Dias managed to win the favor of Wimala Dharma, a prominent Sinhalese leader. This unexpected shift in allegiance positioned him as a figure of influence within the Sinhalese camp. His adeptness in navigating the colonial politics of the time became evident when he convinced Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo of his capability to assassinate Wimala Dharma. Azevedo, enticed by the prospect of eliminating a significant adversary, promised Dias high honors in return. This alliance was cemented through a dramatic display of loyalty; Dias returned to the Sinhalese camp with Portuguese banners and severed heads, successfully reducing suspicion about his true intentions.

The culmination of Dias's duplicity came with the planned assassination of Wimala Dharma. However, the intricate web of deceit he had woven began to unravel, as trust eroded within both camps. Dias's eventual downfall highlighted the perilous nature of such treacherous endeavors, underscoring the volatile interplay between colonial powers and local resistance.

By 1597, the Portuguese were engaged in a desperate struggle to maintain their foothold in Sri Lanka. Sinhalese resistance, led by figures such as Edirille Rala, employed guerrilla tactics that strained Portuguese resources and morale. These relentless assaults depleted Portuguese ammunition and weakened their defensive positions. Amidst this turmoil, reinforcements led by Dom Diogo, brother of Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), arrived. These fresh troops, including five hundred Christian topazes from Colombo, provided a critical boost to the beleaguered Portuguese forces. Their timely intervention inflicted significant casualties on the Sinhalese, including the death of key leaders like Iddagado Rala.

The arrival of Dom Diogo's forces marked a pivotal shift in momentum. The exhausted Portuguese soldiers, having withstood three days of relentless attacks, found a brief respite. This moment of deliverance allowed them to regroup and prepare for the subsequent phases of their campaign. Following these initial victories, the Portuguese launched a determined pursuit of Edirille Rala, who had sought refuge with Wimala Dharma Surya. The arrival of additional troops from India enabled Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo to mount a renewed offensive. Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) played a crucial role in this campaign, constructing strategic fortifications in Uduwara and Rayigam Korale to consolidate Portuguese control.

The construction of these fortifications, initially of wood and later upgraded to stone by Antonio Carvalho de Silva, was a strategic masterstroke. These structures not only served as defensive strongholds but also symbolized the enduring Portuguese presence in the region. Edirille Rala's capture, facilitated by the betrayal of a local woman driven by poverty, marked a significant turning point. Brought before the Mudaliyar, Edirille Rala was treated with a mix of respect and strategic triumph. His capture underscored the effectiveness of Portuguese military strategy and local intelligence networks.

Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's reflections on this improbable victory revealed the complex emotions and strategic considerations underlying such triumphs. The Portuguese, despite their military prowess, were acutely aware of the precariousness of their control. The victory, achieved through a combination of strategic reinforcements and local betrayals, highlighted the fragile nature of colonial dominance. The capture of Edirille Rala and the establishment of new fortifications had profound implications for Portuguese efforts to maintain control over Sri Lanka. These victories provided a temporary respite but also foreshadowed ongoing conflicts and resistance. The strategic importance of these fortifications, coupled with the psychological impact of such victories, bolstered Portuguese resolve in their colonial endeavors.

This narrative underscores the tumultuous and often precarious nature of Portuguese colonial rule in Sri Lanka, marked by a complex interplay of loyalty, betrayal, and strategic maneuvering, reflecting the broader dynamics of colonialism and local resistance in the region.

57.16 Administrative Corruption and Strategic Challenges: The Portuguese Rule in Ceilao (1594-1598)

Between 1594 and 1598, Portuguese colonial authorities in Ceilao (now Sri Lanka) engaged in severe mismanagement and exploitation of resources, leading to significant administrative abuses. This period of rampant corruption and exploitation drew the ire of King Felipe II of Spain, who faced considerable challenges in maintaining effective colonial governance.

Reports sent to King Felipe II highlighted the exploitation of resources by Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo and other Portuguese officials. They notably misused ships for personal gain rather than military purposes and engaged in illicit extraction of gemstones, including a ruby allegedly the size of a small chicken egg. This level of exploitation epitomized the corruption permeating the administration.

In response to these abuses, Felipe II enacted a series of stringent measures aimed at curbing exploitation and restoring order. However, his efforts were often thwarted by the entrenched interests of local Portuguese officials, revealing the broader difficulties inherent in colonial administration. The King's directives to his Viceroy to address these issues met with mixed success, reflecting the complexities and resistance within the colonial framework.

During this same period, King Dharmapala of Kotte faced increasing pressure from both the Portuguese and local factions. Desperate to curb Azevedo's authority, Dharmapala repeatedly sought the intervention of the Viceroy. His pleas highlighted the broader issues of resource mismanagement and administrative inefficiency under Portuguese rule. Reckless deforestation for shipbuilding and other abuses prompted Dharmapala to request experienced judges to assist in governance. These appeals underscored the significant challenges of maintaining effective colonial administration amidst local resistance and internal corruption.

The aggressive expansionist policies of the Portuguese during this period further exposed their strategic vulnerabilities. The scarcity of troops and resources from Goa rendered it difficult for the Portuguese to maintain their hold over Ceilao, especially against a well-informed and strategically patient adversary like Wimala Dharma. This era demonstrated the inherent weaknesses in the Portuguese colonial strategy.

Compounding these issues, the hardships of the campaign, including disease and malnutrition, pushed the Portuguese garrison to the brink of mutiny. The internal challenges faced by the garrison, combined with external threats from the Sinhalese resistance, highlighted the fragile nature of Portuguese control over the island. These difficulties were exacerbated by the aggressive policies and strategic missteps of the colonial administration, further illustrating the precariousness of Portuguese colonial endeavors in Ceilao.

In summary, the period between 1594 and 1598 was marked by severe administrative and resource mismanagement by Portuguese authorities in Ceilao, leading to widespread exploitation and corruption. The subsequent royal response, local resistance, and strategic vulnerabilities collectively underscored the significant challenges and fragile nature of Portuguese colonial rule in the region.

57.17 The Formation and Impact of Portuguese Provinces in Sri Lanka (1597-1612)

The period between 1597 and 1612 marked a pivotal era in the colonial history of Sri Lanka, characterized by the establishment of Portuguese provinces on the island. Following the death of King Dharmapala, the Portuguese embarked on a significant reorganization of their territorial control, aiming to consolidate their dominance and streamline governance. This restructuring led to the division of the conquered territories into four major provinces (also known as disawani): Matara, Saparagamuwa, Four Korales, and Seven Korales. Each of these provinces, known as Disawanis, was governed by a Disawa, who was entrusted with overseeing administrative, judicial, and military affairs.

The administrative structure established by the Portuguese was hierarchical, with the Disawas at the helm, responsible for maintaining order, collecting taxes, and ensuring the smooth functioning of the colonial administration. This system was designed to solidify Portuguese control over the island and manage the complexities of colonial governance effectively. Matara emerged as the most important province due to its fertile lands and strategic location, while the other provinces, representing the Maya Rata, also played crucial roles in the Portuguese colonial strategy. Notable leaders, such as Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), were instrumental in managing these territories, balancing the demands of colonial governance with the intricacies of local politics.

The establishment of these provinces marked a significant period in Sri Lanka's colonial history, laying the groundwork for future conflicts and the eventual decline of Portuguese power in the region. The strategic and administrative decisions made during this period had long-lasting effects on the island's socio-political landscape, shaping the future of Sri Lanka's colonial history. The Disawas were crucial in overseeing governance and judicial administration within their respective provinces, resolving local disputes, enforcing colonial laws, and maintaining order. The judicial system during this period often reflected a blend of Portuguese legal principles and local customs, highlighting the complexities of colonial governance.

Economically, the Portuguese administration focused on exploiting the resources of their provinces, particularly gemstones and spices, which were critical to the colonial economy. This exploitation often led to conflicts with local populations, who resented the disruption of their traditional economic practices. The military organization of the provinces was also a key aspect of Portuguese control, with local militias composed of recruits supplemented by Portuguese soldiers. These forces were responsible for defending the territory against both internal resistance and external threats from neighboring kingdoms.

Culturally, the Portuguese presence in Sri Lanka led to significant exchanges between the colonizers and the local population. The introduction of Christianity, European art and architecture, and new agricultural practices were notable changes brought about by Portuguese colonization. However, these cultural exchanges also led to conflicts, as the Sinhalese sought to preserve their traditions and autonomy. The legacy of Portuguese colonization in Sri Lanka is complex and multifaceted, characterized by both the introduction of new technologies and cultural practices, as well as significant social and economic disruptions.

In summary, the period of Portuguese colonization in Sri Lanka from 1597 to 1612 was marked by significant administrative, economic, and cultural changes. The establishment of Portuguese provinces and the governance strategies employed during this time had profound and lasting impacts on the island's socio-political landscape, influencing subsequent colonial powers and shaping the modern history of Sri Lanka.

57.18 The Fall of Kotte: Portuguese Consolidation and Local Resistance in 1597

The year 1597 stands as a pivotal moment in the history of Sri Lanka, then known as Ceilao, marking the culmination of Portuguese consolidation and the end of native rule with the death of King Dharmapala. Dharmapala, the last monarch of the Kingdom of Kotte, passed away in 1597, bringing a significant shift in the island's governance. His reign had been deeply intertwined with Portuguese interests, as evidenced by his conversion to Christianity, a move that further isolated him from his predominantly Buddhist subjects. His death, marked by Christian burial rites at the Convento de São Francisco, symbolized the growing influence of the Portuguese and the end of an indigenous royal lineage.

Dharmapala's tenure as king was fraught with familial power struggles and an increasing dependency on Portuguese military support, which alienated him from his people. Despite the complex and often adversarial dynamics of his reign, Dharmapala was honored posthumously with the title The Most Highly Frost Dom Joam, by the Grace of God King of Ceilam, Perea Pandar, reflecting the Portuguese efforts to legitimize their rule through the deceased monarch's Christian identity.

The same year also witnessed severe hardships for the Portuguese forces stationed in Sri Lanka. Following Dharmapala's death, the Portuguese faced a relentless siege that underscored the dire circumstances and formidable resistance they encountered. At Gurubewila, the Portuguese garrison endured extreme scarcity of food, receiving only a plate of rice daily for two weeks—a stark contrast to the customary three rice meals of the Sinhalese. This blockade made even the simple act of fetching water a perilous endeavor, illustrating the severe constraints under which the Portuguese operated.

Faced with starvation and the imminent threat of annihilation, the Portuguese forces decided to break the siege. This desperate retreat was characterized by a display of solidarity, as the ailing Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo chose to travel on foot with his men. Their journey was fraught with peril, navigating through enemy territory and facing constant harassment from Sinhalese forces. A significant ambush resulted in the death of the rear guard capitao and the loss of the Portuguese standard, delivering a severe blow to their morale.

Over the course of three grueling days and nights, the Portuguese forces endured relentless attacks. Domingos Correa, supported by elephants, launched a determined assault on the Portuguese vanguard, resulting in a chaotic melee where friend and foe were indistinguishably entangled. The Portuguese suffered substantial casualties, with only a fraction of their original force remaining able-bodied. The turning point came when Correa was severely injured, leading to a temporary reprieve for the beleaguered Portuguese. Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo seized this opportunity to signal a retreat, underscored by the haunting sound of their remaining musical instruments.

The Portuguese retreat, marked by the abandonment of their dead and mortally wounded, highlighted the severe challenges they faced in maintaining their foothold in Sri Lanka. The relentless pursuit by Iddagoda Rala, who took command after Correa's injury, underscored the ongoing resistance against the Portuguese presence. Despite managing to evade capture near the desecrated temple of Horana, the Portuguese ordeal in 1597 underscored the immense difficulties of colonial conquest and the fierce resistance from the local population.

These events of 1597 were crucial in shaping the colonial history of Sri Lanka. The death of King Dharmapala and the ensuing consolidation of Portuguese power marked the end of native rule and set the stage for continued conflicts over control of the island. The hardships faced by the Portuguese highlighted the intense local resistance and the complex interplay of power, culture, and survival that characterized this period. This narrative of 1597, therefore, not only marks a significant chapter in the history of Portuguese Ceilao but also provides a poignant reminder of the resilience and enduring spirit of the Sinhalese people in the face of colonial ambitions.

57.19 Conflict, Alliance, and Strategic Dynamics in Early 17th Century Sri Lanka

The early 17th century in Sri Lanka was a period marked by significant conflicts and strategic alliances, deeply influenced by the actions of prominent figures and the shifting dynamics of European colonial powers. The Karava caste played a pivotal role during this era, with notable leaders such as Don Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (commonly known as Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)) and Kuruvita Rala (also referred to as Antonio Barreto). Their leadership and contributions have been extensively documented by historians such as Abeyasinghe,[5] C. R. de Silva,[6] and Raghavan.[7] Another influential Karava leader, Don Manuel Dias d'Anderado, notably received substantial rewards from the Dutch in the mid-17th century, highlighting the fluid nature of loyalties and the strategic recognitions bestowed by European powers on local leaders.

One of the key military engagements of this period was the Siege of Talampitiya in 1603. This Portuguese fortress was besieged by Kandyan forces, leading to severe hardships for the Portuguese defenders, who suffered from disease and severe shortages of food and water. The siege culminated in Captain Francisco Maçedo de Silva surrendering to the 10000 Kandyan troops. The Kandyan forces were supported by the Dutch, under the command of Vice-Admiral Seebald de Weert. However, this alliance was fraught with tension due to cultural misunderstandings and insults,[8] resulting in the execution of de Weert by the Kandyans and the subsequent withdrawal of Dutch support.

The desperation of King Wimala Dharmasuriya during this tumultuous period led to heinous acts against Portuguese prisoners, including torture and mutilation. These atrocities underscore the intense animosity and desperation that characterized the conflict between the Kandyans and the Portuguese.

From 1605 to 1613, the Portuguese administration in Sri Lanka faced ongoing conflicts and significant changes in command. Military leaders such as Azevedo and Salvador Pereira de Silva were heavily criticized by authorities in Goa for their failures. This criticism led to a restructuring of the army by Azevedo, resulting in the reassignment of Samara de Cunha y Rala (Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon)), who eventually ascended to the position of capitao of Ormuz, illustrating the shifting fortunes within the Portuguese military ranks.

Sri Lanka's strategic importance to the Portuguese was paramount, particularly in the context of the Mughal threat to Goa. Viceroy Don Francisco da Gama underscored the island's value as a critical stronghold and potential fallback position for the recapture of Goa if necessary. However, in January 1605, the Portuguese King ordered a suspension of the war in Sri Lanka due to its exorbitant costs. The focus was then shifted towards expelling the Dutch from the Moluccas and the East coast of Sri Lanka, with patrolling the seas becoming a priority to thwart Kandyan trade.

This period in Sri Lanka's history reflects the complex interplay of local leadership, European colonial ambitions, and the strategic significance of the island, set against a backdrop of intense military conflict and shifting alliances.

57.20 Colonial Ambitions and Local Resistance: The Portuguese Influence in Early 17th Century Sri Lanka

In the early 17th century, Sri Lanka was a battleground for power, marked by the strategic maneuvers of both local and colonial forces. The ascension of Ayres de Saldanha as Viceroy in 1600 set the stage for renewed Portuguese efforts to consolidate their control over the island. Upon his appointment, de Saldanha was confronted with the defiance of the King of Jaffna, who had allied with Wimala Dharma in breach of a treaty with the Portuguese. To address this insubordination, de Saldanha dispatched Manuel Barreto da Silva to subjugate Jaffna. Despite the King's formidable army of 12000 men, efforts by Frei Manuel of Sao Matias to mediate and avert conflict underscore the period's complex interplay of diplomacy and military might.

The Portuguese, under the command of Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, reinforced their positions with additional troops, enabling rapid advancements that secured strategic locations such as Ganetenna and the high pass entrance to the mountains. However, internal discord between Azevedo and Salvador Pereira da Silva, former allies, complicated the Portuguese campaigns, illustrating the fractious nature of colonial military leadership.

The fort of Balana, in Chapter 56, perched atop a mountain range, emerged as a pivotal stronghold due to its natural defenses and control over access to the Sinhalese kingdom. The fort's impregnable position rendered it a critical military asset, with dominance over Balana signifying broader strategic control over Sri Lanka's mountainous terrain.

The mid-17th century saw further turmoil as the Portuguese and Dutch vied for dominance. The Battle of Diagam in 1654, notably documented by Joao Ribeiro and P.E. Peiris,[9][10] highlighted the fierce struggle for Caltura (Kalutara). This conflict emphasized the strategic value of regions such as Uduwara and showcased the prominent role of local families like the de Silvas in the ongoing colonial contest.

Portuguese rule in Sri Lanka also precipitated profound cultural and social transformations. The introduction of Christianity, driven by an aggressive campaign to establish churches and convert the local populace, left an indelible mark on Sri Lankan society. While some communities embraced Christianity, others resisted, leading to a syncretic religious landscape where multiple faiths coexisted.

The Portuguese influence extended beyond religion, permeating the linguistic and cultural fabric of the island. The introduction of the Portuguese language and customs blended with indigenous traditions, fostering a unique cultural synthesis. Portuguese architectural styles, particularly in fortifications and ecclesiastical buildings, became entrenched in Sri Lanka's built environment, contributing a lasting architectural legacy.

In summary, the Portuguese era in Sri Lanka was characterized by relentless conflicts, strategic alliances, and significant cultural exchanges. This period of colonial rule not only defined the political landscape but also deeply influenced the cultural and social development of the island. The enduring impacts of Portuguese colonization are evident in the religious, linguistic, and architectural imprints that continue to shape Sri Lankan society. As the first European colonial power to establish a foothold on the island, the Portuguese set the stage for subsequent colonial encounters, embedding a legacy that would influence the trajectory of Sri Lanka's history for centuries.

57.21 Resistance and Retribution: The Seven Korales Uprising and Portuguese Struggles in Kotte

In 1601, the Seven Korales region of Sri Lanka emerged as a critical battleground in the struggle for control, with Manuel Gomes, an officer among the Portuguese, playing a central role. This period of conflict began with an uprising led by the local inhabitants of the Seven Korales, who launched a devastating campaign along the coastal area from Chilaw to Negombo. They targeted churches, killed priests, and appropriated holy vessels, displaying their vehement opposition to Portuguese rule. In retaliation, the Portuguese executed a ruthless campaign against the villagers, executing those they deemed guilty. However, they failed to capture Gomes, who became a symbol of the resistance. Simultaneously, Sinhalese forces attacked Portuguese outposts, engaging in fierce battles, and transforming the entire district into a relentless war zone.

The conflict escalated until May 1601, culminating in the ambush and death of Manuel Gomes. Despite the intense fighting and significant casualties on both sides, a semblance of peace was restored, although some regions like Etgalatota remained restless. This turbulent period highlighted the region's volatility and the ongoing resistance against Portuguese dominance.

In the subsequent years, the Portuguese faced further challenges in their attempts to consolidate control. Under the command of Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, the Portuguese meticulously planned a military operation to secure a decisive victory. This operation involved posting detachments along the route from Colombo, with sealed orders directing all soldiers to converge on Ganetenna on a predetermined day. The operation was strategically timed for Easter night, with the expectation of a triumphal entry into Senkadagala.

However, the advancing Portuguese forces encountered unforeseen obstacles. An encounter with a wild elephant, which attacked the soldiers, resulted in injuries and fatalities, serving as an ominous sign of the unpredictable challenges they faced. Contemporary accounts imbued this incident with symbolic meaning, reflecting the broader difficulties confronting the Portuguese.

At Balana Fort, in Chapter 56, Portuguese plenipotentiaries were allowed entry but were quietly arrested by Sinhalese forces lying in ambush. The pre-agreed signal for a Portuguese attack was delayed by Simao Pinhao, who advised waiting until dawn. Before dawn, three lascarins, along with the arrested plenipotentiaries, brought news of the ambush. This setback forced the Portuguese to retreat and return their garrisons to their initial positions.

In the aftermath of the failed coup, the Portuguese experienced a significant retrenchment. In a gesture of gratitude for his loyalty and service, King Wimala Dharma appointed Manuel Dias as Maha, or Chief Mudaliyar. This appointment underscored the strategic acumen and resilience of the Sinhalese resistance, marking a significant setback for Portuguese ambitions in the region.

This period in Sri Lanka's history illustrates the intense resistance against foreign intervention and the complex dynamics of colonial warfare. The Seven Korales uprising and the subsequent military confrontations reveal the determination of the local population to resist foreign domination and assert their sovereignty. The Portuguese, despite their military prowess, faced significant challenges in subduing the Sinhalese resistance, ultimately highlighting the resilience and strategic ingenuity of the local forces.

57.22 Colonial Encounters and Indigenous Resistance: Portuguese-Sinhalese Relations in the 16th Century

In the early 16th century, the Portuguese arrived in Sri Lanka, marking the beginning of a significant period in the island's history characterized by strategic military and economic maneuvers aimed at controlling the lucrative spice trade and extending their dominance over the Kingdom of Kotte. Initially establishing a foothold in the coastal regions, the Portuguese gradually expanded their influence, leveraging their superior naval capabilities and advanced weaponry. This era saw the Kingdom of Kotte becoming a focal point of Portuguese ambitions, with the coastal regions being particularly vulnerable to their expansionist policies.

The Portuguese presence in Sri Lanka, however, was met with persistent and organized resistance from the local Sinhalese leaders and the broader population. This resistance was not merely sporadic but was indicative of a deep-seated discontent with foreign domination. Among the various uprisings, the rebellion led by Manuel Gomes in the Seven Korales stands out. Gomes, who held a significant position within the Portuguese ranks, emerged as a prominent figure in the local resistance movement. His rebellion, though ultimately resulting in his death, significantly disrupted Portuguese control and galvanized further resistance efforts across the region. The Seven Korales uprising became emblematic of the broader struggle against the Portuguese, showcasing the determination and resilience of the Sinhalese people in the face of foreign encroachment.

Another critical figure during this period was Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, whose campaigns exemplified the Portuguese efforts to consolidate their power through military might. Azevedo's aggressive strategies aimed at quelling resistance and securing Portuguese dominance were met with varying degrees of success. His failure during the coup attempt at Balana Fort highlighted the limitations and challenges faced by the colonial forces, despite their technological and strategic advantages. This failure not only underscored the resilience of the indigenous resistance but also exposed the vulnerabilities within the Portuguese colonial enterprise.

The broader context of Portuguese-Sinhalese relations during this period is thus marked by a dynamic interplay of conquest and resistance. The Portuguese, driven by economic and strategic interests, sought to impose their control over Sri Lanka's rich resources, particularly its spice trade. In response, the Sinhalese leaders and populace engaged in continuous and organized resistance, striving to preserve their sovereignty and way of life. This period of Sri Lankan history is a testament to the complexities and multifaceted nature of colonial encounters, where the aspirations of European powers clashed with the determined efforts of local populations to resist subjugation and maintain their autonomy. The legacies of these interactions have left an indelible mark on the historical trajectory of Sri Lanka, shaping its socio-political landscape in profound ways.

57.23 Transformations and Turmoil: The Portuguese Legacy in Sri Lanka

The Portuguese period in Sri Lanka, spanning from 1505 to 1658, stands as a pivotal era that brought profound cultural and social transformations to the island. This period was marked by aggressive attempts at religious conversion, significant socio-economic shifts, and enduring resistance that have left a lasting legacy on the nation's identity and historical consciousness.

One of the most notable aspects of Portuguese influence was their zealous effort to convert the local population to Christianity. The Portuguese established numerous churches and missions throughout the island, aiming to supplant the deeply entrenched Buddhist and Hindu practices with Catholicism. However, these missionary activities were not met with passive acceptance. Instead, they often led to violent confrontations, epitomized by the resistance in regions such as the Seven Korales. The imposition of a foreign religion catalyzed a series of rebellions and conflicts, underscoring the local population's resistance to abandoning their traditional beliefs and practices.

In addition to religious upheaval, the Portuguese colonial administration implemented economic policies that disrupted existing trade networks and altered the island's socio-economic landscape. The Portuguese focused heavily on the lucrative spice trade, particularly cinnamon, which was in high demand in Europe. They established monopolies and introduced taxation systems that redirected the economic benefits towards the colonial rulers, thereby undermining traditional economic structures. This shift not only reoriented trade patterns but also impacted the societal hierarchies and livelihoods of the local population, embedding a colonial economic legacy that would influence Sri Lanka for centuries.

Despite the imposition of foreign rule and the disruptions it caused, the period is equally remembered for the fierce and enduring resistance it engendered among the Sri Lankan people. Figures such as Manuel Gomes emerged as symbols of this resistance, challenging Portuguese dominance through various acts of defiance, including the notable but ultimately unsuccessful coup at Balana Fort. These acts of resistance were not merely isolated incidents but part of a broader, cohesive struggle against colonial oppression. They have since been enshrined in Sri Lankan national consciousness as emblematic of the island's enduring spirit of resilience and autonomy.

The Portuguese era in Sri Lanka offers crucial lessons on resilience and the complex dynamics of colonial encounters. It underscores the capacity of the Sri Lankan people to adapt, resist, and ultimately reclaim their autonomy in the face of foreign domination. The resistance movements during this period are celebrated as foundational episodes that contribute to the narrative of national pride and identity. They provide invaluable insights into the strategic and tenacious efforts of the local population to maintain their cultural and political integrity.

In essence, the Portuguese period in Sri Lanka is a testament to the island's complex history of colonial interaction. It highlights the profound cultural and socio-economic changes brought about by European colonialism and the enduring legacy of resistance that these changes provoked. Understanding this period is crucial for comprehending the broader historical trajectories of Sri Lankan identity and the continuous struggle for self-determination.

57.24 Turbulent Alliances and Power Struggles: Portuguese and Dutch Interactions in Early 17th Century Sri Lanka

The history of Sri Lanka during the Portuguese period is marked by intense conflict, political intrigue, and the involvement of various European powers. The Portuguese arrival and subsequent interactions with the local kingdoms, particularly Kandy, set the stage for a turbulent era characterized by shifting alliances, military campaigns, and the eventual emergence of Dutch influence. This narrative explores the key events and dynamics of this period, focusing on the Portuguese efforts to consolidate power and the responses from local rulers and other European entities.

In 1602, the Franciscan monopoly over missionary activities in Ceilao was dismantled, allowing Jesuits, Augustinians, and Dominicans to enter the scene. This diversification of religious influence coincided with renewed military efforts by the Portuguese to exert control over the island. However, the Portuguese campaign to consolidate power faced significant challenges. An expedition led by Azevedo in 1603 aimed to subjugate Kandy but ended in failure. This setback led to the disintegration of the initial Portuguese territorial domination system. The accession of King Senarat to the throne of Kandy in 1604 prompted another reconquest effort by the Portuguese in 1605, but despite persistent attacks, they failed to achieve definitive success.

The period from 1605 to 1617 saw continued conflicts and revolts. A significant revolt led by Nikapitiya Bandara in the mid-1610s forced a peace agreement between the Portuguese and the Kingdom of Kandy in 1617, where the King of Kandy became a vassal of the Portuguese Crown. This treaty exemplified the complex power dynamics of the period, with local rulers leveraging alliances and rebellions to navigate the foreign presence.

Simultaneously, the arrival of Dutch forces began to reshape the geopolitical landscape. Responding to requests for more troops, Viceroy Ayeres de Saldanha dispatched around 1100 Portuguese soldiers in November 1602, i.e. 300 from Goa and 40 from Cochin, together with voluntary casados, reinforcing the Portuguese position against Kandy. However, the Dutch East India Company (VOC) started exploiting the instability in Sri Lanka. Joris van Spilbergen, representing the VOC, arrived in 1602 and met with King Wimala Dharmasuriya of Kandy, offering European gifts and seeking an alliance against the Portuguese. This marked the beginning of Dutch involvement in Sri Lanka.

Following Van Spilbergen, another VOC expedition led by Vice-Admiral Seebald de Weert arrived, with the King of Kandy seeking Dutch assistance in defeating the Portuguese, promising harbor access in return. This engagement highlighted the increasing Dutch interest and influence in the region, setting the stage for future conflicts.

Seebald de Weert, a Dutch captain for the VOC (Dutch East India Company), arrived in Sri Lanka in 1602. His arrival was part of the VOC's efforts to establish a presence and gain control over the spice trade in the region. However, his mission ended tragically. De Weert and his crew were killed by the forces of King Vimaladharmasuriya I of Kandy due to misunderstandings and escalating tensions.

The Sinhalese were very moderate in alcohol use[11]. Indeed, two thousand years of Buddhism, with its prohibition on alcoholic beverage consumption, made the Sinhalese, almost a people of abstainers. 'They despise drunkenness,' Robert Knox wrote, who lived in Ceylon for many years in the seventeenth century, 'Neither are there many who surrender to it.' Many spirits are distilled from coconut palms (toddy), the juice drained from flowering coconut palms, mainly for export. Men from higher castes do not touch alcohol because this is socially unacceptable, and the possibility that women would consume alcohol does not come into Sinhalese's head[12]. Note that in the 21st century, many of these traditions have changed, however, although it remains taboo. Water, in the past, was the standard beverage. The Sinhalese enjoyed craving a stimulant or sedative with the chewing of betel leaves obtained from plants belonging to the pepper family. This bulat witte [13] is chewed together with a slice of healthy areca nuts and a little lemon, sometimes tobacco is added. The chewing of betel leaves is common in all social classes of the Sinhalese society, just as drinking tea in Japan is standard practice.

'Betelblad gives a virgin to her lover,' as they say in Sri Lanka. The refreshment is offered to each guest and accompanies every invitation to participate in the harvest or attend a wedding. It often hides the bribe with which a citizen tries to establish a conversation with an official. The nobleman is accompanied on his journey by a page with long hair carrying a large embellished betel bag over his shoulder while bearing a richly decorated box of gold or silver filled with lemon in his hand. This mild stimulating substance replaces the desire for alcoholic drinks that annoys the Orientals.

The arrival of Seebald de Weert (Antwerp 1567 - Batticaloa 1603) and his drunken sailors marked a new period in the history of Ceylon. The exact details of the tragedy that followed are not known. It annoyed Wimala Dharma that Portuguese sailors of four Portuguese vessels taken by Seebald de Weert in Batticaloa's vicinity had been released by the Dutch in contrast to his orders. Still, he nevertheless allowed Seebald de Weert a formal audience, on which the Emperor pressured to visit his ships. But the Emperor had no appetite for this. Next, the Dutch vessels' attack on Galle was discussed, and the Emperor urged the Dutch to sail to Galle. Then, he said, he must return to the capital, where he left the Empress alone. Seebald de Weert, who was under the influence of liqueur, declared in clear terms that if the Emperor did not visit his ships, he would not sail to Galle in his turn and ended with a rude remark to the Empress. The agitated monarch proudly turned his back on the drunken sailor and commanded the waiting noblemen to 'tie that dog.' Four of them lay their hands on him, at which point he took his rifle and shot for help. He tried to escape from the room, but one of the noblemen grabbed him by the hair while another drew his sword and shut his head. The Emperor had not witnessed what happened, and he was despondent when he heard about it, but the doom could not be reversed, and it was decided, now that the leader had been killed, to kill all others as well. Orders were given to chasing the drunken Dutch out of the houses. Consequently, over fifty were killed with the sword. Some managed to escape by swimming to the ships. A young man was saved and hired by the Emperor. The news of the event, no less tragic than unexpected, caused fear on board the ships, but the Dutch were convinced that there had been a misunderstanding, and the following day they sent a Sinhalese ashore with a letter. Shortly after that, a message from the Emperor was received. 'He who drinks wine,' wrote the king, 'is disgusting. God has made the right to prevail. If you wish peace, there will be peace. If you want war, there will be war.'

[11] That is the assumption made by Peiris.

[12] This may have been so when Peiris wrote his book.

[13] the author did not analyse the etymology properly, but 'bulat' means leaf, i.e. 'blad' in Dutch, while 'witte' or 'witta' must have been associated with white chalk used, i.e. 'wit' in Dutch

The Dutch promptly sent a submissive reply to the Emperor, who was already on his way back to his capital, and fourteen days later, a messenger arrived at the Dutch ships. He had a letter from Wimala Dharma with him. The Emperor assured that his attitude towards the Dutch remained unchanged and that he invited the sailors to assist him in the conquest of Colombo and Galle. Negotiations did not lead to an agreement, and on July 28, the fleet sailed away without having done anything. The folly of a drunken Dutchman had prevented the removal of the Portuguese from Ceylon.

Portuguese military campaigns towards Kandy faced significant challenges. In January 1603, Acevedo intensified efforts to capture Kandy, anticipating Dutch support for the Kandyans. Despite additional Portuguese troops, the campaign faced challenges, including desertion by lascarins, leading to a retreat and subsequent regrouping for another attempt. At the Balana hill, in Chapter 56, Dom Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon) joined Acevedo, but the renewed assault faced stiff resistance. Antonio Barreto, a Karava lascarin, distinguished himself during this period, but the Portuguese faced setbacks, including a siege of Sitawaka. On March 23, 1603, Captain-Major Pereira de Silva led a defense of Sitawaka, showcasing Portuguese resilience but underscoring the complexity of their military engagements and reliance on local allies.

The Portuguese period in Sri Lanka was characterized by relentless military campaigns, strategic alliances, and the growing influence of other European powers like the Dutch. Despite their efforts, the Portuguese faced continuous resistance from local kingdoms and shifting dynamics due to the involvement of the VOC. The period from 1602 to 1617 encapsulates a crucial phase in Sri Lankan history, marked by conflict, negotiation, and the intricate interplay of regional and European forces.

For the rest of 1603, nothing significant took place in Ceylon because the people were too exhausted to resume the battle. In 1604 the state of affairs changed by Wimala Dharma's death. Continuous exposure to the struggle had not missed its influence on this man of steel, and frequent fever attacks warned him that he did not have much longer to live. The weary King began to put his household in order. He summoned his ministers into his room and presented them to his cousin Senerat, who had stripped his priesthood and assumed the regent position while his son, Astana Bandara, was still a minor. He asked them to swear support and loyalty. The elderly chiefs stood immobilized while the tears flew over their faces drawn by the war, while the prime minister made the desired promise on behalf of all. They retreated, and the still youthful Queen and her young children were called and solemnly entrusted to the regent's concerns.

'A mile north of the modern city of Kandy is the hill of Asgiriya. The curious visitor who dares to approach through the miserable environment will see a little bit aside a narrow path that runs through bare grass. Also, there are some old trees with heavily smelling ivory-colored flowers, which overshadow a small temple of massive stones. Behind it is a railway tunnel from which clouds of sooty smoke sometimes escape and close to a Christian school, which can perhaps be seen as a possibility to bring a doomed people back to life,' says Peiris.

It is at this place that centuries ago, the rulers of Senkadagala were cremated. Here, a large pyre was set up, loaded with the wealthiest oriental spices. Accompanied by the shrill wailing of the flutes and the gloomy drums on the funerary drums, Wimala Dharma's body, in a slow procession in which thousands walked, who had known the hairy-faced tall figure of the monarch, was brought to the stake. After a few hours, there was merely ashes left, but, as they say, if one touched it, the heart of the deceased, the brave soul that had beaten so many years leading the country, appeared to be unblemished by the fire.

A sigh of gratitude rose from Portuguese Asia when the 'Sword of the State' had passed into the hesitant grip of Senarat, the former priest.

There was now a dark veil over Kandy's issues. During the next seven years, hardly any glimpse would be seen of whatever was happening behind it. King Filipe II of Portugal was more than tired of the war. He proposed to distribute the Island of Ceylon among the Sinhalese, with Prince Dom Joao, who was still being raised at one of Goa's colleges, becoming one of the rival kings of Ceylon. This idea was, however, not accepted. On the contrary, the prince was sent to Europe shortly after that. In return, the Viceroy was busy organizing a large expedition to withstand the Dutch's rising power in the southern seas and told Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo to hold himself until he went to Colombo and returned to Galle.

In the meantime, there was bitterness and, not without reason, complaining about the oppression and tyranny of the indigenous population by Portuguese officials. They had expected more justice from them than they were accustomed to getting from their people. The pearl fishing proceeds were correctly calculated, and ammunition for warfare was systematically smuggled into enemy territory, even from the Portuguese settlements on the south of India's shores. Above all, there was the ever-present fear of the Dutch's intrigues, whose ships had already been seen on the west coast of Ceylon and provided with information by spies in Colombo.

With the death of Wimala Dharma, however, things were changing. The general let King Felipe III know that the politics of concentration, recommended by the Viceroy, would have a disastrous influence on the Sinhalese spirit, who remained loyal to the Portuguese power. He also said that this policy would, at the same time, inform the Dutch of a possibility to obtain support in the center on the Island. Instead, he trusted that the immediate addition of three hundred soldiers to his army would allow him to conquer Ceylon once and for all. King Felipe III agreed. The conquest's work had already cost so much blood and money that it was no longer possible to withdraw. A strict investigation was carried out into the behavior of officials who did not comply with the law. Simultaneously, instructions were issued that the departure of ships from suspicious ports would be carefully controlled. The coast from Manar to Galle would be blocked to prevent the foreigners from getting contact with Sinhalese. Because of these measures, the Sinhalese remained devoid of necessary goods that the Island itself did not produce.

Clothing was the most important of these; by far, the most clothing that Ceylon needed was imported from the Dutch East Indies. Opium came in second place, which was consumed in large quantities by the Sinhalese. Although drug abuse was not widespread, they found it a powerful contraceptive against various diseases that lie in wait in a hot and very humid country. People in the highland mainly needed salt, which was, at that time, not sufficiently found in Ceylon and was primarily obtained from the salt pans beyond the Walawe Ganga River. Another salt supply source was the Chilaw district, while there were also large quantities at Trincomalee and Jaffna. This local salt, transported to Kandy on the back of oxen in the dry season, was usually obtained by evaporating seawater, a standard method in China and taken over centuries ago. However, the demand for salt was higher than the supply, which is why shiploads of salt were brought in from the south of the Dutch East Indies. The Portuguese believed that if the offer of three necessary products were cut off for three years, the Sinhalese would be forced to submit, and King Felipe III ordered this plan to be carried out with vigour.

It was instructed to strengthen the fortifications of both Galle and Colombo without delay. The port of Galle, the first most southern port in Asia, was of the utmost importance for trade in the Southern Seas, and it was feared that the Dutch would attempt to conquer it. King Felipe was committed to building a yard and an arsenal in Galle, but this was thwarted by the local authorities, who could not agree on the necessary steps. The customs duties, the proceeds of Manar and the debts owed by various Indian Princes were made available to Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo for making expenses for warfare. The Bishop of Cochin, under whose spiritual jurisdiction Ceylon was placed, was invited to visit the Island, not so much to encourage the soldiers, but to see that the indigenous people were treated fairly and mildly by the officials, strictly forbidden to leave with the trade.

Senerat was not the only enemy. 'Satan' also had to be fought, because the possession of land with vast resources was important, not only for the 'Império Português do Oriente,' but also for the souls of thirty thousand professing Christians whose redemption could be endangered if they fell into the hands of infidels, or into those of unbelieving brothers of the heretical Dutchmen. One of the matters ordered was that no Sinhalese might be baptized until he was adequately taught the catechism because the King knew that Pro-forma baptisms did not produce real Christians. Six years earlier, his predecessor had ordered many priests to be sent to the Island. They would subsequently be deployed to teach the faith and the proclamation of the Gospel. Therefore, they had to familiarize themselves with the national language since interpreters in the past had not been successful. As a result, the Jesuits, who settled in India in 1540, sent a few members to Ceylon. They were welcomed by Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, whose own brother was a very prominent member of the Societas Jesu, despite opposition from the Franciscans. The general built a casa for them in Colombo, where they opened their Colégio in 1605. He assigned them the 62 villages that formerly belonged to the Munnesseram Temple, together with some valuable royal communities. Soon after, the Jesuits, the Dominicans and Augustinians came to Ceylon. An attempt was made to divide the Island among the four monastic orders, but nothing happened in practice.

More was needed to preserve Ceylon for the Portuguese than missionary enthusiasm. Still, Goa's political authorities could not offer this because all available resources had been assigned to the personal expedition of vice-minister Dom Afonso de Castro in 1606 to the Southern Seas. The voyage of the Viceroy was joined by Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala ('Samarakoon'), to whom the King had tried to provide relief for the great injustices he received from the hands of Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo. Orders were issued that the Singhalese nobleman had to be treated with all due care, that all his confiscated belongings must be returned, and that all his demands and those of his family must be honored. He was even named Capitao of Goa, a position that provided him with a seat in the Concelho do Estado da India of the Viceroy. This award would probably never be given to an Oriental in the next 300 years by any European government. Again, the primordial reason was that he was of Portuguese descent.

The fleet with which the Viceroy left was the largest fleet ever out of Goa. A series of problems ended in the Portuguese's total failure to reach their goal, and the Viceroy himself died in June 1607 of a heart problem in Malacca.

Aid from Goa was desperately needed in Sri Lanka. The board members of Colombo wrote to the King to inform him. In the three years that preceded 1609, Colombo received only fifty men from India. Dom Jerónimo was only capable of sending two expeditions to combat the enemy for one year. They received orders to kill every animal they encountered and bring back all the food they could lay their hands on. Simao Pinhao and Simao Correa and Dom Constantino Navaratna, a descendant of the royal family who succeeded Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala ('Samarakoon') in Matara, were usually at the head of these expeditions. Still, despite all the efforts, the Portuguese were starving.

Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo's disappointment manifested itself in more cruelty, while he left his non-commissioned officers' actions to the population, to themselves. Because of this, everyone acted as he saw fit. There was lawlessness. The Sinhalese community was subjected to terribly severe extortion; their temples were ruthlessly destroyed. While the services of loyal Sinhalese, such as Samarakoon, were poorly rewarded, apostates of the kind from Simao Correa were welcomed with open arms and promoted to high power and responsibility positions. Colombo's fortifications were so neglected that cattle could easily find their way over the walls; there was no hospital worthy of the name. The soldiers died of hunger and distress because their salary was not paid. The military walked around in clothes that were little better than raw animal skins. The Frenchman François Pyrard de Laval, who visited Ceylon in 1608, has left a report. He wrote that the Portuguese soldiers were primarily criminals and exiles, and that only women with a bad name were sent to Ceylon. He added that,

'the Sinhalese do not want to kill their Portuguese prisoners, but send them back with their nose cut because they did not want to pollute their land with the bodies of strangers'[14]. It was typical for Portuguese soldiers who had committed a crime to take sides with the Sinhalese to escape their sin's consequences. To avoid this, a sanctuary was built in Colombo, followed in 1610 by a shrine in Galle. The criminals who sought refuge in such shelter could not be arrested there, except in cases of high treason, falsification of currency or the murder of a judge.

In the 20 years preceding 1610, 12000 Portuguese lived on the Island, and it had cost the treasury half a million cruzados, but the end seemed to be further away than ever. In a secret letter that someone wrote to King Felipe, he says,

"I declare that the main cause is that we, the Portuguese, are evil Christians who have little fear of God."

Under such circumstances, it was not surprising that the King expressed his bitter disappointment about a company's failure that had looked so promising. There could scarcely be a more favourable occasion to complete the task, for, in 1609, the Twelve Years' Truce was agreed with the United Provinces. In the same year, Senerat married the Queen-widow, ceased all opposition to the Portuguese, and consolidated his position by ascending the throne. The truce meant a formal recognition of the latter's independence because hostility towards the VOC and their allies were forbidden.

In 1611, the Portuguese government in India made 700 Portuguese soldiers available to Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo. In August of that year, he went to war with 700 Portuguese soldiers and 25000 lascarins. When crossing the Mahaweli Ganga River, the Sinhalese offered some resistance. But when the Portuguese began to recede at a particular moment, Frei Gaspar de la Madalena, a Franciscan monk, jumped into the river, raised a cross and called the men to follow him. Challenged by religious enthusiasm and excitement, they attacked and soon expelled the enemies from their defences. The Portuguese took the deserted capital of Kandy and set it on fire. After destroying the surrounding country and housing a garrison of two companies, commanded by António Costa Monteiro, in Balana, the Portuguese retreated to Colombo, followed by enemies who attacked the rearguard and killed many men. After his defeat, Wimala Dharma submitted to the Portuguese and handed both his sons to some Franciscan monks' hands to be raised as Catholics. A treaty was formed with the King of Kandy, and in a letter to King Felipe III, Wimala Dharma congratulated the monarch on his accession to the throne.

Since the death of Wimala Dharma, King Senerat lived in the right relationship with the Dutch. On March 8, 1612, the under-factor Marcellus Boschouwer arrived with the 'Black Lion' in Ceylon. He travelled to the court, armed with letters from the States-General and Prince Maurice of Orange, addressed to 'The Most Illustrious and Most Noble Emperor of Ceylon, Our Beloved Weapon Brother.' His visit was so successful that on May 11, a treaty was concluded between Sinhalese and Dutchmen, whereby the two contracting parties agreed to support each other against the Portuguese, while the Dutch were allowed to build a fortress in Kottiyar on the east coast of the Island, giving them control over the beautiful port of Trincomalee[15]. Between the Dutch and the Sinhalese, unlimited trade was permitted, while their officers would punish misbehavior. The Emperor also agreed to give the Dutch the monopoly on cinnamon business, precious stones and pearls, although he reserved the right to mint coins. They also decided that two Dutchmen would be included in the Emperor's War Council.

[14] In this context, we must not forget that the French had put an eye on Iberia during those days and began to hamper Spain and Portugal wherever and whenever they saw an opportunity. Laval must, in this context, be seen as a source of propaganda by the French.

Marcellus Boschouwer was so popular with Emperor Senerat that he could not decide to let him leave. He received a golden headband from a dignitary with whom he deliberated. He took place between the nobles at the court of Senerat, under the name 'Migamuwe Rala of the seaport Negombo, given to Marcellus Boschouwer for his support.' The Emperor also gave him a Sinhalese princess as a wife.

57.25 Strategic Fortifications and Military Campaigns: Portuguese Efforts to Consolidate Control in Kotte (1607-1613)

The Portuguese period in Kotte is characterized by a series of leadership changes and strategic maneuvers aimed at consolidating control over Sri Lanka, reflecting a period of intense military campaigns and political machinations from 1607 to 1613. This narrative explores the key events and strategies employed by the Portuguese during this tumultuous time, highlighting the complexities of their efforts to dominate the region.

In 1607, the King of Portugal shifted his focus towards the ongoing war in Sri Lanka, implementing policies designed to secure loyalty and strengthen Portuguese influence. This included offering lands to loyal subjects, whether Portuguese, Sinhalese, or of mixed heritage, and sending orphan girls from Portugal to marry local Sri Lankans. This policy of fostering blended families within the fortresses was seen as a solution to previous disloyalty issues, echoing strategies employed by De Albuquerque a century earlier. The Portuguese embarked on extensive fortification efforts from 1607 onwards, constructing new fortresses in key locations such as Colombo, Negombo, Panadura, Kalutara, Alutgama, Galle, Weligama, and Matara. These fortifications were crucial in strengthening their strategic positions and preparing for renewed military campaigns against the Kandyan kingdom. The renewed focus on military campaigns saw the Portuguese launching a series of attacks on the Kandyans, beginning in the spring of 1609. Notably, in February 1610, Major Dom Francisco de Menezes and Simao Correa led an invasion of Kandy through Rakgahawatta and the Seven Korales via Matale. A famous place in the Matale district is Dambulla, shown in Figure 57.16. By August 1611, the Portuguese, alongside lascarins and approximately 700 soldiers from Goa, attacked Kandy again, this time avoiding the Balana pass. Prominent figures such as Domingos Carvalho Cam, Luis Gomes Pinto, and Luis Cabral de Faria played significant roles in these campaigns. Despite some successes, the Portuguese faced significant challenges. The capital, Senkandagala, was abandoned and burned by King Senarat, who relocated to Diyatilaka. Carvalho Cam became the capitao of Balana, but his efforts were hampered by insufficient supplies from Goa, which was preoccupied with the siege of Malacca and the Achin war. Again, it is essential to note that all this took place during the 12-year truce between Spain (which then included Portugal) and the Netherlands, described in Chapter 34.5.2, and that the VOC made use of this opportunity to expand in Asia. This abuse of trust would lead to an end of the truce, described in Chapter 34.5.6. Nevertheless, Carvalho Cam managed a surprise attack on Senarat, forcing the Kandyans to retreat to Kandy. Defending Malacca became the highest priority. That this has been taken seriously can be found in the inscription in Figure 57.15.

The period from 1612 to 1613 witnessed further leadership changes and strategic adjustments. In December 1612, Acevedo left Sri Lanka to become Viceroy at Goa, and Dom Francisco de Menezes Roxo succeeded him as the capitao-general in Sri Lanka. Roxo's tenure, however, was marked by ineffectiveness and exploitation by King Senarat. Subsequently, Manoel Mascarenhas Homem, formerly the commander at Malacca, took over as capitao-general.

Acevedo, drawing from his experience, recommended an economic embargo against Kandy rather than a direct military confrontation. The embargo aimed to isolate Kandy by sealing off the harbors of Batticaloa, in Figure 57.17, Trincomalee, and Kottiyar, thereby cutting off trade, particularly with India. . The harbor of Trincomalee, just like Sydney, in Figure 57.18, in Australia, is a natural deep-water harbor, excellent for large ships, including submarines. Despite its strategic intent, the embargo proved ineffective as foreign vessels, particularly those of the VOC, managed to bypass the blockade. Acevedo also advised Homem to continue military campaigns against Kandy, emphasizing the need for more disciplined and capable leadership. Leaders like Simao Correa and Luis Gomes Pinto were recommended for their proven abilities, with the goal of executing more professional and strategic attacks to maintain pressure on the Kandyan kingdom.

The period from 1607 to 1613 was marked by significant military and strategic efforts by the Portuguese to establish control over Sri Lanka. Despite facing numerous challenges and setbacks, the Portuguese leadership continued to adapt and refine their strategies. The ongoing conflicts and adjustments during this period highlight the complexities of colonial ambitions and the resilient resistance of the local kingdoms. The Portuguese fortification efforts, combined with their aggressive military campaigns and strategic embargoes, reflect a determined yet often challenged pursuit of dominance in the region.

57.26 The Portuguese Influence on Sri Lankan Socio-Political Dynamics

Before the arrival of the Portuguese, Sri Lanka was a vibrant island with a rich history and a complex socio-political structure. The island was divided into several kingdoms, with Kotte, Kandy, and Jaffna being among the most prominent. These kingdoms engaged in trade with various Asian and Middle Eastern countries, contributing to a diverse cultural and economic landscape. The Age of Exploration in the 15th and 16th centuries saw European powers like Portugal, Spain, and later the Netherlands and England, seeking new trade routes and territories. The Portuguese, in particular, aimed to control the spice trade and establish a maritime empire stretching from Africa to Asia.

The Portuguese first arrived in Sri Lanka in 1505, led by explorer Lourenço de Almeida. Initially, their presence was marked by peaceful trade negotiations with the local Sinhalese rulers. However, the strategic importance of Sri Lanka in controlling the Indian Ocean trade routes soon led to Portuguese ambitions for dominance. The Portuguese established a fort at Colombo and entered into a treaty with the Kingdom of Kotte. This treaty allowed the Portuguese to secure trading privileges and establish a foothold on the island. The Portuguese traded in spices, precious stones, and other local goods. They also introduced new crops and animals to the island, impacting the local economy and agriculture.

Over the next few decades, the Portuguese solidified their presence through a combination of military conquests and strategic marriages. They built fortresses along the coast and took control of key trade routes, gradually eroding the autonomy of local kingdoms. The Kingdom of Kotte, weakened by internal strife and Portuguese manipulation, eventually fell under Portuguese control. The conversion of King Dharmapala to Christianity and his subsequent vassalage to the Portuguese crown marked a turning point in Sri Lanka's history. The Portuguese established an administrative system that integrated local practices with European governance models. They appointed local chieftains as intermediaries, ensuring their rule extended into the interior regions.

[15] A similar event occurred in the early 21st century by donating control of the harbor to the Chinese.

King Dharmapala of Kotte, heavily influenced by the Portuguese, adopted Christianity and became a vassal of the Portuguese crown. This alliance significantly altered the power dynamics in the region, leading to internal strife and external threats. Dharmapala's conversion to Christianity and the subsequent persecution of Buddhists created deep divisions within Kotte. The Portuguese used religion as a tool to consolidate their power, often at the expense of local traditions and practices. The Portuguese engaged in numerous military campaigns to suppress rebellions and expand their territory. They formed alliances with local chieftains, using them to control rebellious regions and ensure the flow of tribute.

The Portuguese exploited internal divisions within Kotte, manipulating local politics to their advantage. This period was characterized by betrayals and shifting alliances as the Portuguese sought to strengthen their control over the kingdom. The Kingdom of Kandy, under the leadership of King Senarat, emerged as a major center of resistance against Portuguese rule. Senarat's efforts to forge alliances with the Dutch and other European powers highlight the complex geopolitical landscape of the time. The Portuguese imposition of Christianity and European customs met with varying degrees of resistance and adaptation. Local populations navigated these changes, leading to a syncretic blend of traditions in some areas.

57.27 Diplomacy and Conflict: The Struggle for Dominance in Sri Lanka (1610-1617)

During the period from 1610 to 1617, Sri Lanka experienced a complex interplay of diplomatic maneuvers and military confrontations as various powers sought to assert their influence over the island. This era is marked by the intricate efforts of Senarat of Kandy to secure his kingdom against Portuguese domination through strategic alliances, most notably with the Dutch East India Company (VOC).

Amid the broader context of the Twelve Years' Truce between Spain (and its Portuguese territories) and the Netherlands, the VOC endeavored to extend its reach into Asia, including Sri Lanka. Recognizing the potential for a formidable alliance, Senarat initiated diplomatic overtures toward the Dutch. Key figures in these negotiations included Captain Willem Janssen (a ship's captain of the Dutch vessel Eendracht, anchored off Batticaloa) and Charles de Lannoy, who initially approached these proposals with caution. Nevertheless, these efforts bore fruit in 1610 with the establishment of a commercial treaty, marking the beginning of a tentative alliance between Kandy and the Dutch.

The Portuguese, vigilant of Dutch encroachments, responded with a mix of diplomacy and coercion. They sought to undermine the burgeoning Dutch-Kandyan relations by negotiating a ceasefire with Senarat. A pivotal figure in these negotiations was Friar Gaspar da Madanela, whose mediatory efforts culminated in a peace treaty ratified in 1617. Despite this formal agreement, sporadic conflicts persisted, reflecting the fragile nature of peace in the region.

Throughout this period, the Dutch continued to cultivate their relationship with Kandy, as evidenced by the correspondence between Marcellus de Boschouwer and Portuguese officials. This ongoing diplomatic engagement facilitated the Dutch's establishment of a fortress at Kottiyar, a strategic move that underscored their intent to solidify their foothold on the island. However, this expansionist ambition inevitably led to friction with the Portuguese, who were discontented with the Dutch presence and demands.

The tension between the Dutch and Portuguese escalated into military confrontations. One notable incident involved an expedition led by Simão Correa to Kottiyar, resulting in the killing of Boschouwer's men. This violent clash exemplified the volatile nature of the rivalry between the European powers in Sri Lanka.

Concurrently, Senarat's kingdom was beset by internal strife, further complicating the political landscape. The suspicious death of one of Senarat's sons and the queen's abortive attempt to defect to the Portuguese—an effort that ended in her death in 1613—exacerbated the instability within the Kandyan court. These internal challenges undermined Senarat's authority and weakened his position against external threats.

In summary, the period from 1610 to 1617 in Sri Lanka was characterized by a series of diplomatic and military engagements involving the Kandyans, the Dutch, and the Portuguese. The strategic alliances, treaties, and conflicts of this era reflect the complex dynamics of power and resistance that shaped the island's history. The interplay of external pressures and internal discord during these years set the stage for the continued struggle for dominance in Sri Lanka.

57.28 The Struggle for Sovereignty: Portuguese Aggression and the Battle for Control (1638-1654)

The period from 1638 to 1654 in Sri Lanka's history was marked by persistent conflicts and the struggle for control between the Portuguese and the local Sinhalese population, alongside emerging Dutch interests. Portuguese aggression was characterized by continuous military expeditions and efforts to consolidate control over the island, despite the limitations imposed by scarce resources from Lisbon. The imposition of Christianity by the Portuguese administration exacerbated tensions, further alienating the predominantly Buddhist Sinhalese populace.

One notable episode during this period was the ill-fated expedition led by Pere Lopes de Sousa to Kandy. This endeavor highlighted the ongoing conflict and the significant challenges faced by the Portuguese, including logistical difficulties and robust resistance from local forces. The expedition's failure underscored the complexities of imposing foreign rule in a region deeply resistant to external control.

Religious and cultural tensions were a significant aspect of the Portuguese administration's rule. The favoritism shown towards Christianity by the colonial rulers fostered deep-seated resentment among the Buddhist Sinhalese. This religious favoritism fueled a desire among the Sinhalese to restore a native king to power, thus intensifying local resistance against Portuguese dominance.

The Battle of Diagam in 1654 was a critical event in the broader Dutch-Portuguese conflict over Sri Lanka. This battle, aimed at recapturing Kalutara from the Dutch, was meticulously documented by historians Joao Ribeiro and P.E. Peiris. Their accounts provide a detailed narrative of the tactics employed and the outcomes of the battle, offering valuable insights into the period's military strategies and the complex interplay between local and colonial forces.

The strategic importance of Uduwara and its surroundings was evident in the ongoing contest between the Dutch and Portuguese.

Control over these areas was crucial for maintaining dominance in the region. The Battle of Diagam not only highlighted the tactical significance of Uduwara but also underscored the broader struggle for supremacy between European colonial powers in Sri Lanka.

Through detailed accounts by Ribeiro and Peiris, the intricacies of the battle are brought to light, revealing the multifaceted nature of the conflict. These narratives underscore the significant impact of colonial ambitions on the local population and the enduring resistance against foreign domination. The period from 1638 to 1654 thus stands as a testament to the relentless pursuit of control by the Portuguese, the strategic maneuvering by the Dutch, and the persistent struggle of the Sinhalese to reclaim their sovereignty.

57.29 The Transition of Power: From Portuguese to Dutch Dominance in Sri Lanka

The transition of power in Sri Lanka during the late 16th and early 17th centuries was marked by rapid geopolitical changes and the emergence of the Dutch East India Company (VOC) as a dominant force. This period saw the decline of Portuguese influence and the rise of Dutch power, profoundly impacting the island's socio-political landscape.

In 1598, Felipe III ascended to the throne of Spain, initiating a period of political and commercial decay in Portugal, which had been ruling Sri Lanka. This decline was a pivotal moment, coinciding with the Dutch beginning their maritime expeditions to the East. By 1602, the VOC was established, and Joris van Spilbergen led a significant Dutch expedition to Sri Lanka. His arrival on May 31, 1602, marked the beginning of Dutch engagements with the island.

Spilbergen's diplomatic efforts with the Sinhalese, particularly with Emperor Wimala Dharma Suriya of Kandy, were crucial. The reception Spilbergen received was ceremonious and involved numerous negotiations. The Emperor, impressed by the Dutch envoy, offered him all the pepper and cinnamon from his imperial warehouses, signaling the beginning of a trade relationship that would be pivotal for the VOC's interests.

The Dutch were keen observers of local customs and dietary practices, noting the Sinhalese's largely vegetarian diet influenced by Buddhist teachings and their unique use of spices. This cultural exchange extended to the presentation of European-style banquets, reflecting the Emperor's familiarity and appreciation of Portuguese customs despite the hostilities.

The early 1600s were marked by significant military engagements between the Sinhalese and the Portuguese. The Portuguese attempts to consolidate their power, as evidenced by Dom Jerónimo's campaigns, met with varying success. However, the Dutch, under leaders like Seebald de Weert, capitalized on these conflicts. De Weert's arrival in 1603 and his subsequent interactions with the Emperor were indicative of the complex alliances forming in the region.

Joris van Spilbergen, upon his departure, left two musicians, Hans Rempel and Erasmus Martsberger, with the Emperor, reflecting the Emperor's appreciation for Western music. This gesture symbolized the Dutch's diplomatic strategy of using cultural exchanges to strengthen alliances. Additionally, Spilbergen captured several Portuguese ships, further straining Portuguese resources and demonstrating Dutch naval prowess.

De Weert's arrival in November 1602 was significant. He engaged in negotiations with Wimala Dharma, promising to assist in military campaigns against the Portuguese. Despite initial successes, including capturing large quantities of cinnamon and pepper, de Weert's mission ended tragically. His disrespectful behavior towards the Emperor and the Empress led to his execution and the massacre of his men. This incident highlighted the volatile nature of early Dutch-Sinhalese relations.

The mid-17th century marked the decline of Portuguese power in Sri Lanka, culminating in the fall of Colombo in 1656. The siege of Colombo was a protracted and intense confrontation. The Dutch employed a combination of naval blockades and relentless land assaults, which eventually forced the Portuguese to surrender. This victory was a turning point, solidifying Dutch control over Sri Lanka and ending over a century of Portuguese dominance.

During this period, significant figures included Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, the Portuguese general whose military campaigns and harsh policies against the Sinhalese marked the last efforts of Portuguese resistance. The Sinhalese noble Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala, known as Samarakoon, played a complex role. Initially allied with the Portuguese, he later faced imprisonment and exile due to his shifting allegiances and the volatile political environment.

The transition to Dutch rule brought significant administrative changes. The VOC implemented new governance structures aimed at maximizing resource extraction, particularly in the lucrative spice trade. However, this period was not without resistance. Local populations, wary of yet another foreign dominion, often resisted Dutch policies, reflecting the island's complex colonial history.

The Dutch influence in Sri Lanka extended beyond politics and economics. Their presence left a lasting imprint on the island's cultural and social fabric. The Dutch introduced various administrative and architectural innovations, many of which have endured. Additionally, their interactions with local populations led to a blending of cultures, evident in the lasting influence of Dutch customs and practices.

Marcellus Boschouwer's arrival in 1612 marked another pivotal moment. He successfully negotiated a treaty with Emperor Senerat, granting the Dutch significant commercial privileges and the right to build a fortress in Kottiyar. Boschouwer's integration into the Sinhalese court, including receiving a Sinhalese princess as a wife and the title "Migamuwe Rala," underscored the deepening Dutch-Sinhalese relations.

In conclusion, the early Dutch influence and the establishment of the VOC in Sri Lanka were marked by strategic diplomacy, military engagements, and significant cultural exchanges. The transition from Portuguese to Dutch control reshaped the island's geopolitical landscape, setting the stage for subsequent colonial interactions and the enduring struggle for sovereignty that has defined much of Sri Lanka's history. The detailed accounts of early Dutch expeditions, alliances, and military strategies, involving key figures such as Joris van Spilbergen, Seebald de Weert, Dom Jerónimo de Azevedo, and Marcellus Boschouwer, provide a nuanced understanding of this transformative period in Sri Lankan history.

57.30 Enduring Imprints: The Portuguese Legacy in Sri Lanka

The Portuguese period in Sri Lanka, spanning from the early 16th century to the mid-17th century, constitutes a significant chapter in the island's history, marked by profound conflicts, dynamic alliances, and notable cultural exchanges. This era's enduring impact is reflected in the architectural, religious, and cultural imprints that persist in Sri Lanka to this day.

The Portuguese arrival in Sri Lanka was primarily driven by their quest for dominance in the spice trade, particularly cinnamon, which was highly prized in Europe. Their initial contact was relatively peaceful, with the Portuguese establishing trading posts and forging alliances with local kingdoms, such as Kotte. However, as their ambitions grew, so did their military engagements, leading to protracted conflicts with various Sinhalese kingdoms and other colonial powers.

One of the most enduring legacies of the Portuguese period is the introduction of Christianity and European customs to Sri Lanka. The Portuguese missionaries were fervent in their efforts to convert the local population to Roman Catholicism. This religious zeal led to the construction of numerous churches, some of which still stand today, bearing testimony to this cultural and religious influence. The integration of Portuguese architectural styles is evident in these structures, showcasing a blend of European and local design elements.

The influence of the Portuguese extended beyond architecture and religion. They introduced new crops, such as chili and pineapple, which have since become integral to Sri Lankan cuisine. Additionally, the Portuguese language left a linguistic legacy, with several Portuguese words being assimilated into the Sinhala and Tamil languages.

Historians and scholars continue to scrutinize the Portuguese period in Sri Lanka, offering diverse interpretations of its impact. This era provides a rich tapestry of interactions between colonial powers and local kingdoms, contributing to the broader understanding of colonialism and resistance. The Portuguese faced formidable resistance from the Sinhalese and Tamil kingdoms, which employed both military and diplomatic strategies to counter the European encroachment. The complex interplay of these forces underscores the resilience and agency of the local populations in the face of colonial aggression.

In contemporary Sri Lanka, reflections on the Portuguese period are characterized by a mixture of pride and ambivalence. While the colonial period brought about significant cultural and economic changes, it also entailed considerable hardship and disruption for the local populace. The fortresses and churches, while architecturally significant, are also reminders of a tumultuous era of conquest and resistance.

The Portuguese period is thus a pivotal chapter in Sri Lanka's history, shaping the island's trajectory towards the present. This period set the stage for subsequent colonial encounters, first with the Dutch and later with the British, each leaving their own distinct legacies. The Portuguese influence, however, remains uniquely significant due to its early introduction of European cultural elements and its role in the broader narrative of global maritime empires.

In conclusion, the Portuguese era in Sri Lanka represents a time of intense cultural and political change, leaving a lasting imprint on the island's heritage. The continued study of this period by historians and scholars not only enriches the understanding of Sri Lanka's past but also highlights the complexities of colonial interactions and their enduring legacies.

Chapter 58

The Critical Voice

58.1 Portuguese propaganda

In the past decade, newspapers in Sri Lanka have reported historical research revealing that the first Portuguese were not fond of the King of Kotte and his entourage. In letters, they claimed that the Sinhala King Bhuvanaka Bahu III of Kotte was involved in practices of sodomy, and the Portuguese were frightened to live there. It is impossible to know to what extent this was true or not, but the letters, dating back to 1547, exist.

Indeed, in a letter by the Portuguese of Ceylon to Joao de Casto dated ’Ceylon, 27th November 1547,’ the Governor of Goa speaks of the abominable crime of the king of Ceylon.

58.2 McGilvray on the Portuguese in Sri Lanka

Not every author writes positively about the Portuguese period of Sri Lanka. To compensate for any possible glorification of that period, we can refer to a paper by someone from the University of Colorado in Boulder.[1]

The work seems somewhat negatively biased, but the level at which it is written is so high that it reads so fluently that the paper’s bias and lack of references appear somewhat disguised. Nevertheless, a ’second opinion’ does not hurt.

McGilvray writes about Portuguese and Dutch Burghers but needs to state how he determined such status. Was it based on what people told about themselves, or did he check their registration, or was it just an assumption based on their looks and religion? It needs to be clarified. So, we will not comment on modern Burghers’ judgment because it is not defined, but we will focus on his statements about the past.

He writes that,

’the Portuguese Burghers, within the Burgher community, are considered the great Burgher residuum: poorer, darker, more numerous and less European.’

He also states,

’that all the burgers are urbanites,’

which, of course, depends on his definition of Burghers.

Many people are of Portuguese descent, but they do not all call themselves Burghers but rather part of the entire communities of Tamils or Singhalese or belong to a specific caste or village, rather than seeking the title Burgher. Most people of Portuguese descent do not even know their origins. This is natural everywhere in the world. Our memories typically span up to four generations.

Then, he refers to Dutch and English literature to conclude that the Portuguese have lower jobs than Dutch burghers. This is a mistake because such writing was merely propaganda, attempting to assure loyalty to the new occupiers rather than the former Portuguese rulers by feeding the population and everyone interested with lousy talk about the Portuguese. McGilvray should have known this when he used those references.

He then writes about the Lusitanian Libido. This is a fascinating topic in his paper for different reasons.

First of all, the Dutch and the British again exaggerated the Portuguese’ libido to destroy their reputation. However, such a rumor may explain the numerous people in Sri Lanka carrying a Portuguese family name, apart from the massive baptisms.

As is described elsewhere in this book, there is a myth in Sri Lanka that Portuguese family names were given when people converted to Christianity. This may be true in many cases, but not all. It is also described why this is not possible. Indeed, given names can be Christian after conversion, but the Portuguese would never have accepted the random use of their cherished family names. It may even have been illegal because some of such names were noble.

So, if so many people carry a Portuguese family name, who was the first to have received this name along their ancestral line? Different options exist. It could have been a married couple’s child, where the father was Portuguese, and the mother was local. It may also have been a child of a local woman who descended from Portuguese and carried a Portuguese name, with a husband who did not have such a name, so the Portuguese name was transmitted to the child.

This may explain the large number of people carrying a Portuguese name.

However, more than this may be required. So, the Portuguese had many more children than the locals in Sri Lanka, making sense if they were more prosperous and could feed their children better.

Besides, many extramarital children of a local mother with a Portuguese father or a father of Portuguese descent existed. All such options were possible and occurred effectively.

The latter assumption is exploited to its fullest extent by McGilvray in his paper when he calls it the Lusitanian Libido. He writes that,

'there is no doubt that, from the outset, the Portuguese conquests in Africa, Brazil, and India were accompanied by widespread and frequent sexual relationships between Portuguese men and local women, causing rapid growth of racially mixed populations in virtually every Portuguese settlement.'

Mixed children were called mestiço and were considered higher in rank by the Portuguese regime than the locals.

Of the persons who originally came from Portugal, there were only three kinds: Soldados, Casados and Padres (respectively, soldiers, people who were no longer soldiers or had never been and could settle and establish their own families, and priests).

There were no European women, except, at some point, orphans sent to Ceylon. This is also found in Charles R. Boxer's work[2].

Then, McGilvray writes that most Portuguese who arrived overseas, including Ceylon, were exiles and criminals from the great Lisbon prison, the Limoeiro, whose sentences had been communicated to military service abroad. This is also found in Charles R. Boxer's work[3]. McGilvray uses this knowledge to explain why many Portuguese were not Catholic and, therefore, subject to their 'Lusitanian Libido.'

He also mentions the classification into five categories of the Portuguese Ceylon population: 'European-born Portuguese'; 'Indian-born Portuguese'; castiços (they had a European father and a Eurasian mother); mestiços (they had a European father and a native mother); 'natives.'

Sometimes mixed children were also called topaz, a word derived from an Indian language (probably from the Goa region) and meant 'bilingual.' Many topaz worked for the Kandyan king as mercenaries when the Dutch had taken over the Portuguese areas of Sri Lanka[4].

McGilvray also mentions that the Portuguese established a local creole language, the island's lingua Franca of government, commerce, and religion.

The author also says that VOC employees who married in Sri Lanka typically did this with Portuguese descendants because the locals were rather hostile towards such marriages, mainly due to their caste system.

We are still determining whether this is true or false.

Furthermore, although the Dutch imposed their language as the official lingua Franca, Portuguese Creole was commonly spoken in the marketplace and in households. Even marriage ceremonies took place in Creole.

Chapter 59

Encyclopedic Overview of the Caste Systems in India and Sri Lanka: Historical Context, Structure, and Contemporary Dynamics

59.1 Introduction

If the Indian caste system were projected onto European history, the Desclergues would be Brahmins. However, the caste system of India and Sri Lanka is far more complicated.
The caste systems of India and Sri Lanka represent complex social hierarchies that have shaped these regions' socio-economic and cultural landscapes for centuries. Rooted in ancient traditions and religious doctrines, these systems have evolved through historical influences, including colonial interventions, and continue to impact contemporary society despite various legal reforms and social movements. This chapter provides an encyclopedic overview of the caste structures in both countries, highlighting their historical origins, hierarchical frameworks, and the enduring legacy of caste-based distinctions. By comparing the Indian and Sri Lankan systems, this comprehensive examination offers insights into the similarities and differences that define the caste dynamics within these neighboring nations. The analysis covers the distinct caste hierarchies among the Sinhalese and Tamils in Sri Lanka, the rigid and complex varna and jati systems in India, and the ways in which colonial and post-colonial developments have influenced these social structures.

59.2 The Indian Caste System

59.2.1 Historical Origins

The caste system is believed to have originated around 1500 BCE with the arrival of the Indo-Aryans, who introduced the Vedic religion. The Rigveda, one of the oldest Vedic texts, mentions the concept of varna (color), which later evolved into the caste system. The Purusha Sukta hymn in the Rigveda describes the creation of the four varnas from the cosmic being Purusha: Brahmins (priests and teachers) from his mouth, Kshatriyas (warriors and rulers) from his arms, Vaishyas (merchants and farmers) from his thighs, and Shudras (laborers and service providers) from his feet. This hierarchical ordering symbolically represented different societal functions.

59.2.2 Varna System

59.2.2.1 Brahmins

Brahmins were priests, scholars, and teachers at the top of the hierarchy. Their primary duties were to perform religious rituals, study and teach the Vedas, and guide other members of society in spiritual and ethical matters. The high status of Brahmins was linked to their supposed purity and their role as intermediaries between the divine and human realms.

59.2.2.2 Kshatriyas

The warrior and ruler class, Kshatriyas, were responsible for protecting and governing the society. They were kings, soldiers, and administrators. Their duties included warfare, maintaining law and order, and governance. They were considered second only to Brahmins in the social hierarchy.

59.2.2.3 Vaishyas

This varna comprised merchants, traders, and farmers. Their primary role was to manage commerce, agriculture, and cattle-rearing. The economic backbone of the society, Vaishyas, was expected to ensure the community's prosperity through trade and business activities.

59.2.2.4 Shudras

Shudras were the laboring class responsible for serving the other three varnas. They were artisans, laborers, and service providers. Their position at the bottom of the varna hierarchy was justified by their involvement in manual labor and activities considered less pure.

59.2.3 Jati System

The varna system provided a broad framework, but the actual social structure was much more complex due to the existence of jatis (sub-castes). Jatis are endogamous groups with specific occupations, regional affiliations, and social customs. There are thousands of jatis, and they determine social interactions, marriage, and professional roles. The relationship between varna and jati is complex, with jatis often being associated with a particular varna but only sometimes fitting neatly into the varna categories.

59.2.4 Social Mobility and Rigidity

Historically, the caste system was rigid, with strict rules governing interactions between castes. Inter-caste marriage and dining were often prohibited. Occupations were hereditary, and mobility between castes was limited. However, there were periods and regions where these boundaries were more fluid.

59.2.5 Colonial and Post-Colonial Impact

The British colonial period (1757-1947) had a significant impact on the caste system. The British administrators codified and rigidified the caste distinctions, using them to structure their policies and governance. They conducted extensive surveys and censuses that categorized Indian society along caste lines, reinforcing caste identities. Post-independence, the Indian constitution abolished "untouchability" and enshrined the principle of equality. The government introduced affirmative action policies (reservations) to improve the socio-economic status of historically disadvantaged groups, particularly Scheduled Castes (formerly known as untouchables or Dalits) and Scheduled Tribes.

59.2.6 Contemporary Caste Dynamics

Today, while legal frameworks and affirmative action policies have challenged the traditional caste hierarchy, caste identities and discrimination persist, particularly in rural areas. Urbanization, economic development, and education have contributed to social mobility and reconfiguring caste relations. However, caste-based discrimination and violence remain significant issues in contemporary India.

59.2.7 Conclusion

The caste system in India is a historically rooted and complex social structure that has undergone significant changes over time. As the priestly class, Brahmins have traditionally held the highest position in this hierarchy, symbolizing spiritual and educational authority. Despite legal and social advancements, the legacy of the caste system continues to influence Indian society profoundly.

59.3 The Sri Lankan Caste System

The caste system in Sri Lanka, like that in India, is a deeply entrenched social hierarchy that has historically influenced various aspects of life, including marriage, occupation, and social status. While there are similarities to the Indian caste system, Sri Lanka's caste structure has its unique characteristics. It has evolved differently due to the island's distinct historical, cultural, and religious contexts.

59.3.1 Historical Context

Sri Lanka's caste system is believed to have been influenced by the Indian caste system through centuries of ethnic, cultural and religious exchanges between the Indian subcontinent and the island. The introduction of Buddhism in the 3rd century BCE and subsequent historical developments significantly shaped the caste dynamics in Sri Lanka.

59.3.2 Major Ethnic Groups and Caste Systems

Sri Lanka's population is primarily divided into two major ethnic groups: the Sinhalese and the Tamils. Each group has its distinct caste system.

59.3.2.1 Sinhalese Caste System

The Sinhalese, who are predominantly Buddhist, form the majority ethnic group in Sri Lanka. The Sinhalese caste system is less rigid than the Hindu caste system in India but still significantly determines social interactions and hierarchies.

59.3.2.1.1 Goyigama The Goyigama caste is the highest and most populous caste among the Sinhalese. Traditionally, members of this caste were landowners and farmers. They held significant social and political power.

59.3.2.1.2 Radala The Radala caste is a sub-group within the Goyigama and is considered to be of aristocratic status. They historically held key administrative and military positions in the Kandyan Kingdom.

59.3.2.1.3 Karava Another prominent caste is the Karava, traditionally associated with fishing and seafaring. Despite their initial lower status, some Karava families gained wealth and influence over time.

59.3.2.1.4 Durava and Salagama These castes are also significant among the Sinhalese. Durava were traditionally involved in toddy tapping and distillation, while Salagama were associated with cinnamon peeling and related trades.

59.3.2.1.5 Rodiya At the bottom of the Sinhalese caste hierarchy are the Rodiya, a marginalized group historically considered untouchable. They faced severe social ostracism and economic disadvantages.

59.3.2.2 Tamil Caste System

The Tamils, predominantly Hindu, also have a caste system similar to that in South India. The Sri Lankan Tamil caste structure is more rigid and closely mirrors India's varna system.

59.3.2.2.1 Vellalar The Vellalar caste is the highest among Sri Lankan Tamils and is traditionally associated with landownership and agriculture. They held significant social and economic power in Tamil society.

59.3.2.2.2 Karaiyar The Karaiyar caste, traditionally involved in fishing and maritime activities, is another important caste among the Tamils.

59.3.2.2.3 Paraiyar The Paraiyar caste, considered untouchable, is at the bottom of the Tamil caste hierarchy. They faced severe discrimination and social exclusion.

59.3.2.2.4 Other Castes There are several other castes among Tamils, including the Koviar (servants), Nalavar (toddy tappers), and Pallar (agricultural laborers), each with its distinct roles and social status.

59.3.3 Colonial and Post-Colonial Impact

The Portuguese, Dutch, and British colonial periods significantly impacted the caste systems in Sri Lanka. Colonial rulers often used caste distinctions to administer the island, particularly for labor and tax purposes. The British, for example, employed caste divisions in the plantation economy, further entrenching caste identities. Post-independence, Sri Lanka's constitution and legal frameworks do not recognize or enforce caste distinctions. However, caste continues to play a role in social relations, marriage, and politics, particularly in rural areas.

59.3.4 Contemporary Dynamics

In modern Sri Lanka, caste identity is less overt than in the past, particularly in urban areas where education, economic opportunities, and social mobility have diluted traditional caste boundaries. However, caste-based discrimination and prejudices persist, particularly in rural communities. The civil war (1983-2009) and subsequent social changes have also impacted caste dynamics, with issues of caste intersecting with ethnic and political identities.

59.3.5 Conclusion

The caste system in Sri Lanka, while historically influenced by the Indian caste structure, has developed its unique characteristics. The Goyigama and Radala castes traditionally held significant power among the Sinhalese, while the Vellalar caste was dominant among the Tamils. Although contemporary legal frameworks do not support caste discrimination, its social impact remains significant, reflecting the deep historical roots of caste in Sri Lankan society.

59.4 Comparative Analysis of the Caste Systems in India and Sri Lanka

59.4.1 Historical Origins and Development

59.4.1.1 India

59.4.1.1.1 Origins The Indian caste system, or varna system, originated around 1500 BCE with the arrival of the Indo-Aryans. The Rigveda mentions the varna system, dividing society into four broad categories: Brahmins, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas, and Shudras.

59.4.1.1.2 Evolution Over centuries, the system became more complex with the development of thousands of jatis (sub-castes). It was deeply intertwined with Hinduism and influenced by religious texts and practices.

59.4.1.1.3 Colonial Impact British colonial rule codified and reinforced caste distinctions through administrative practices and censuses.

59.4.1.2 Sri Lanka

59.4.1.2.1 Origins The caste system in Sri Lanka was influenced by Indian caste dynamics, mainly through cultural and religious exchanges. The introduction of Buddhism in the 3rd century BCE played a significant role in shaping its caste system.

59.4.1.2.2 Evolution The Sinhalese and Tamil populations developed distinct caste systems. The Sinhalese system was less rigid, while the Tamil system closely mirrored the Indian varna structure.

59.4.1.2.3 Colonial Impact Portuguese, Dutch, and British colonizers used caste distinctions for administrative purposes, reinforcing caste identities in various ways.

59.4.2 Structure and Hierarchy

59.4.2.1 India

59.4.2.1.1 Varna System The four varnas are hierarchical, with Brahmins (priests and scholars) at the top, followed by Kshatriyas (warriors and rulers), Vaishyas (merchants and farmers), and Shudras (laborers and service providers).

59.4.2.1.2 Jatis Thousands of sub-castes within these varnas determined specific occupations and social interactions. The jati system was highly localized and complex.

59.4.2.2 Sri Lanka

59.4.2.2.1 Sinhalese Caste System The Goyigama caste (landowners and farmers) holds the highest status, followed by Radala (aristocracy), Karava (fishing and maritime), Durava (toddy tappers), and Rodiya (marginalized group).

59.4.2.2.2 Tamil Caste System The Vellalar caste (landowners) is at the top, followed by Karaiyar (fishing), Paraiyar (marginalized), and other castes like Koviar (servants) and Pallar (agricultural laborers).

59.4.3 Social Mobility and Rigidity

59.4.3.1 India

59.4.3.1.1 Rigidity Historically, the Indian caste system was rigid and had limited social mobility. Inter-caste marriages and occupation changes were rare and often taboo.

59.4.3.1.2 Contemporary Changes Legal frameworks have abolished caste-based discrimination, and affirmative action policies have aimed at improving the socio-economic status of lower castes. Urbanization and education have contributed to some mobility.

59.4.3.2 Sri Lanka

59.4.3.2.1 Rigidity The Sinhalese caste system was less rigid than the Indian system, particularly due to the influence of Buddhism. The Tamil caste system was more rigid and similar to the Indian structure.

59.4.3.2.2 Contemporary Changes Caste identity is less overt in urban areas, but discrimination persists in rural regions. The civil war and subsequent social changes have impacted caste dynamics, intersecting with ethnic and political identities.

59.4.4 Cultural and Religious Influences

59.4.4.1 India

59.4.4.1.1 Hinduism The caste system is deeply rooted in Hindu religious texts and practices, which reinforce caste divisions and roles.

59.4.4.1.2 Diversity India’s diverse religious landscape means caste dynamics vary significantly across regions and communities.

59.4.4.2 Sri Lanka

59.4.4.2.1 Buddhism Among the Sinhalese, Buddhism played a role in shaping a somewhat less rigid caste system compared to Hinduism.

59.4.4.2.2 Hinduism Among the Tamils, Hinduism reinforced a caste system similar to that in South India, with a solid religious justification for caste divisions.

59.4.5 Colonial and Post-Colonial Policies

59.4.5.1 India

59.4.5.1.1 British Rule The British codified and reinforced caste distinctions for administrative convenience, deepening caste identities.

59.4.5.1.2 Post-Independence India’s constitution abolished "untouchability," and affirmative action policies were implemented to uplift historically disadvantaged castes.

59.4.5.2 Sri Lanka

59.4.5.2.1 Colonial Rule The Portuguese, Dutch, and British utilized caste distinctions for labor and taxation, entrenching caste identities.

59.4.5.2.2 Post-Independence Legal frameworks do not support caste distinctions, but social and economic realities maintain caste-based disparities.

59.4.6 Contemporary Dynamics

59.4.6.1 India

59.4.6.1.1 Legal and Social Reforms Significant efforts to dismantle the caste system have been made, but caste-based discrimination and violence remain substantial issues.

59.4.6.1.2 Urban vs. Rural Urbanization has diluted caste boundaries to some extent, while rural areas still see strong adherence to caste norms.

59.4.6.2 Sri Lanka

59.4.6.2.1 Civil War Impact The civil war and ethnic conflict have influenced caste dynamics, with caste issues intersecting with ethnic identities.

59.4.6.2.2 Urban vs. Rural Caste identity is less pronounced in urban areas, but rural communities continue to observe caste distinctions.

59.5 Overlaps and Differences

59.5.1 Overlaps

Both systems have historically stratified societies into hierarchical groups with specific social roles.
Both were influenced by religious doctrines (Hinduism in India, Buddhism and Hinduism in Sri Lanka).
Colonial powers in both countries reinforced caste distinctions for administrative purposes.
Contemporary legal frameworks in both countries seek to mitigate caste-based discrimination, though challenges remain.

59.5.2 Differences

The Indian caste system is more complex and rigid, with a broader and more deeply entrenched hierarchy.
The Sinhalese caste system is relatively less rigid compared to the Tamil and Indian systems.
The influence of Buddhism in Sri Lanka contributed to a less stratified society among the Sinhalese compared to the Hindu-influenced Indian and Tamil systems.
Post-colonial affirmative action policies are more prominent in India than in Sri Lanka.

59.6 Conclusion

While India and Sri Lanka have caste systems with historical roots and significant social impacts, the structures, rigidity, and contemporary dynamics differ. India's system is characterized by a more complex and rigid hierarchy deeply embedded in Hinduism. In contrast, Sri Lanka's system varies between the less rigid Sinhalese system influenced by Buddhism and the more rigid Tamil system influenced by Hinduism. Both countries continue to grapple with the legacies of caste discrimination despite legal and social reforms aimed at fostering equality.

Chapter 60

The Karava and Salagama Caste and the Origins of the Olupathage Family

60.1 Introduction

Every family in Sri Lanka has arrived from India. For some, this may have been thousands of years ago; for others, a thousand, five hundred, or sometimes just one century ago. Furthermore, all families in Sri Lanka have mixed genes. Therefore, should every person in Sri Lanka make his ancestry tree and go back many centuries, he will find branches that arrived recently and branches that came much earlier.

For our particular family, the male-line chapter arrived from Goa in India, where a Portuguese forefather, Juan Carvalho de Silva, established them. The caste system in India and Sri Lanka is often associated with past migrations. Sometimes, a whole tribe formed a caste, and sometimes, individual families integrated into an existing caste through profession, marriage, or location.

In our case, everything indicates that the family first incorporated into the Karava or Carea caste and were then, because of location and profession and probably also through marriage, associated with the Salagama caste, also known as Chale caste, just like almost everyone in the village in Sri Lanka where they blossomed for several centuries.

60.2 The House of the Heads

We refer to Figure 60.1 to compare the Sinhala, Hindi and Kanada expressions with the used transcriptions and interpretations. It is vital to investigate the original Sinhala spelling of the name to understand the meaning of Olupathage. Indeed, the Roman alphabet cannot represent each character; therefore, different sounds and words end up equal in the Western alphabet. At the same time, they are different from the original Sinhala.

The term Olu means 'Heads.' The word path is challenging to translate. It resembles words such as 'assigned,' 'selected,' 'appointed' or 'the.'[1]

So, Olupathage means 'The House of the Heads.' We do not know when the name was first used, except that this must have been before 1760, when the Dutch VOC prohibited further name changes.

As the name is not widespread and is even mostly geographically confined to the area around Uduwara, the name was first used as a clan name in the early 18th century and originated literally from the 'House with the Heads' located inside the Uduwara fortress.[2]

Several families received the same clan name Olupathage, because not every Olupathage also has a Portuguese family name. Indeed, 'ge-names originally were not family names but descriptive identifiers typically describing the place where one lived.

Since the family lived in Goa in the early days of the Portuguese presence in India, it is interesting to look at some possible origins of the name Olupathage if the house in Uduwara had been designed to designate the name and not vice versa. The name may originate from the Northern Indian family name ',' which is Pathak, and translates as 'the reader' or 'the scholar,' and that the name degenerated to 'Olu-pathak' in Sri Lanka (with a different sounding 'a') and ultimately adapted to the Karava custom by adding '-ge' and became Olupathage which as described above had a different meaning than pathak. Still, meanings may be lost when subsequent generations change language.[3] Combining 'Olu' with 'Pathak' is not unnatural, as both words somehow refer to a person's brain and mind.

[1] Note that the other word 'White Lotus Flower' would be transcribed from Sinhala into the English alphabet just as olu or oolu, but has, in Sinhala, nothing to do with 'Heads.'

[2] Typically, 'ge-names' originate from an actual home with specific features or functions. We know that the 'House of the Heads' is located in Uduwara and that the ancestors of Shirani de Silva originate from it. What we do not know, however, is whether that house was first constructed and then the family was named after this house or if the family name already existed while the house was built to represent the family name.

[3] For instance, first Hindi and later Portuguese and Sinhala.

Figure 60.3: Salagama peeling and packing Cinnamon by Salagama caste farmers and traders. Note the ornaments on their heads, which they share with the Karava caste.

There is an even more exciting etymology possible. Around Goa, the language spoken was Kannada, apart from Hindi. An analysis is shown in Figure 60.1. So, perhaps the early version of the name was Odupathak and transformed from that to Olupathage by subsequent generations who no longer spoke Hindi or Kannada and became connoted with 'heads' in Sinhala rather than 'reader' in Hindi and Kannada.

60.3 The Sri Lankan Caste System

The caste systems in Sri Lanka and India present fascinating trends in historical claims, social structures, and cultural identities. In Sri Lanka, each caste traces its lineage back to specific kingdoms and ancestors serving ancient kings as soldiers or servants.

This sense of pride significantly shapes their caste identity, though mixed marriages and extramarital children are often excluded from these narratives.

When studying the history of castes, one must exercise caution with sources, as human nature's inherent heroism and vanity can distort historical facts. While pride in one's heritage is commendable, it is crucial to adhere to verified facts.

Western classifications of Sri Lankan castes, which often simplify them into categories like fishermen, farmers, or weavers, can be misleading.

Historical records show that castes were not limited to single professions. For instance, although the Goyigama caste is frequently labeled as farmers and landowners, many members were also engaged in fishing.

Similarly, while the Salagama caste is often associated with weaving and cinnamon peeling, some members were involved in military activities and trade. The Karava and Salagama castes, having arrived in Sri Lanka when land ownership was already established, were less involved in paddy agriculture and more in other professions. This is corroborated by early 17th-century Portuguese tombos (land registers), which show few Karava and Salagama as landowners.

Contrary to the caste system in India, the caste system in Sri Lanka may not be as rigid or extensive.

Much of the discourse on castes in Sri Lanka is rooted in myths and misconceptions. People often identify their family with a particular caste and seek to elevate their status by asserting their caste's superiority. The term 'caste' itself, derived from the Portuguese word casta, was initially used to identify tribes and clans rather than social hierarchies.

Literature on the subject reveals astonishing beliefs, with some claiming descent from kings or highly esteemed ancestors. However, before the Portuguese period, names in Sri Lanka were fluid identifiers that could change based on a person's location or profession and were not strictly inherited.

The arrival of the Portuguese heightened the importance of names, which began to be inherited, like in Europe, reflecting one's noble status. The Dutch, arriving through the VOC around 1760, further institutionalized this practice, making names strictly hereditary.

Two significant works that delve into this subject are B. J. Perera's 'The Ge names of the Sinhalese' and M. D. Baghavan's 'The Karava of Ceylon, Society and Culture.'

Perera's work examines the evolution of Sinhalese names, while Baghavan explores the societal and cultural aspects of the Karava caste.

Many Sri Lankans have changed their names in the past century to avoid associations with lower castes, reflecting ongoing social dynamics.

60.4 The Karava and Salagama Castes

60.4.1 Historical Origins and Migration

Based on comprehensive research, including DNA analysis, it can be concluded that the Olupathage de Silva clan originally hailed from India's Goa region. They were initially identified as Karava or associated with the Karava due to a presumed common origin, despite lacking a ge-name. Upon settling in Uduwara near Kalutara, they adopted the name Olupathage. Subsequently, through intermarriage with the Salagama caste, the Olupathage clan assimilated into the Salagama caste. Both the Karava and Salagama castes likely descended from Goa, and this transition was possibly driven by economic factors, as discussed further. Genetic evidence supports links with numerous Karava members.

The Olupathage de Silva family is firmly established within the Salagama caste, also known as the Hali or Chali caste. This situation is unusual as the name Olupathage is typically associated with the Karava caste and, in rare instances, the Govi caste.

The author's wife's grandfather, Peiris de Silva, bore a name commonly found in the Karava caste.
The family's rituals resemble those of the Karava caste, although similar practices are observed in the Salagama caste.

60.4.2 Social and Economic Factors

The traditions and terminology of both castes, along with their myths of origin and geographic overlap, suggest the possibility of caste switching across generations, particularly following mixed marriages. For instance, the name Suriya, prevalent in Karava family names, also serves as a heraldic symbol in the Salagama caste. This indicates that a family generation may have chosen to identify as Salagama (Hali or Chali) during the Dutch colonial period when the Dutch allowed Salagama families to monopolize the cinnamon trade, as shown in Figure 60.3.
Economic pressures likely necessitated the Olupathage de Silva family's association with the Salagama caste, mainly due to their involvement in cinnamon cultivation. Roberts[4] mentions that during the seventeenth century, the Portuguese coerced various castes, including the Karava, into cinnamon-peeling services. Similar accounts are found in the works of C. R. de Silva[5] and D. A. Kotelawele[6].

60.4.3 Family and Caste Dynamics

The Olupathage de Silva family originally stemmed from a mixed marriage in Goa. Being mestiços, their descendants could easily navigate life as Portuguese, Karava, or both. Upon settling in Uduwara, Sri Lanka, they were joined by both Karava and Salagama castes, who were amicable towards the Portuguese in both India and Sri Lanka.
According to M. U. De Silva[7], by 1769, the cultivation of cinnamon had become successful, and Mudaliyars and Muhandirams were instructed to plant cinnamon. The Dutch policy favored the Salagama caste, providing them with privileges and substantial lands. This policy encouraged social and economic mobility within the Salagama caste, allowing them to amass wealth and status.
During the VOC period, cinnamon workers from the Salagama caste, who were not landowners, sometimes registered their children under a different caste to avoid economic restrictions. This strategy highlights the flexibility and social mobility within the caste system, driven by economic incentives and colonial policies.
M. U. De Silva[8] notes that Salagama headmen prospered under Dutch rule, expanding their plantations and elevating their social status. In contrast, Karavas were often allocated positions as weavers and fishers. Thus, a Karava involved in cinnamon cultivation had solid economic incentives to integrate into the Salagama caste.

60.4.4 Migration and Cultural Integration

The Karava, originally from the Kuru Kingdom in Northern India, gradually migrated to Sri Lanka through various Indian regions, including Tamil Nadu. Historians such as Peiris[9] and Jayasekara[10] support this migration narrative. Both economic opportunities and colonial interactions influenced the Karava migration patterns.
The Portuguese favored importing caste members from friendly Indian territories to establish better relationships in Sri Lanka. This facilitated the integration of various castes, including the Karava and Salagama, both prominent in coastal regions.
During British rule, the exchange of people and goods between Sri Lanka and Southern India continued to be encouraged, further mixing the population. Roberts estimates that by 1820, the Karava comprised 9% of Sri Lanka's population, the Durava 3%, and the Salagama 4%. In Kalutara, the population distribution in 1814 included 22Roberts also notes various castes' economic activities and social status, highlighting the Karava's roles in unloading vessels and carpentry. This socio-economic mobility allowed families like Olupathage de Silva to strategically choose caste affiliations based on economic benefits.

60.4.5 Salagama Caste and Economic Contributions

The Salagama caste, also known as Halagamas, Chalias, or Halias, claim their origins in Kerala. While initially cloth weavers, they turned prominent in the cinnamon trade during the Portuguese and VOC periods. The Salagama caste is now known for entrepreneurship, owning large businesses, and holding top-level positions. The caste's pride is reflected in the Singhalese saying,
"Salagamas must never be humiliated."
During the VOC period, the first professional large plantations were established in Sitavaka, Matara, and Kalutara, the latter being

The events are chronologically presented: the groom, welcomed by young singers Lanka, Mangala, and Kumari; the city registrar certifying the marriage; the couple's bonding with a cotton thread and water symbolizing family unity and the passage of time; symbolic textile and golden ornament exchanges; offering beetle leaves to family members; the exchange of wedding cake; and the beginning of an exciting life for the couple. The Tangerine Beach Hotel in Kalutara holds significance for the author, who stayed with his foster parents in room 401, near the Presidential Suite and the manager's apartment. During the JVP resurrection in 1987, the author sought refuge at the hotel, protected by secret agents. Despite the turmoil, love for Sri Lanka endured, leading to subsequent returns. A 2007 photo shows the hotel's post-tsunami refurbishment. On the second wedding day, the groom and bride again exchange cake, and the 'Sri-Bo-Male' is visible. The lighting of a candle symbolizes life, the sun, and wisdom. The wedding was bittersweet as the bride's youngest brother, pictured, remained unmarried after their parents' passing but later married and started a family. Additionally, the bride is pictured with her eldest sister's two youngest children at 'Goda Galla' rock, marking the northern sea boundary of Kalutara. The three-day ceremony included multiple food occasions, with the tradition of offering each other and closest family members the first bite of food. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

where Uduwara is located and where the Olupathage de Silva family flourished in the cinnamon business. Early in the British period, cinnamon remained economically significant due to the momentum from the VOC period. However, the industry gradually declined because the British needed more expertise in cinnamon cultivation, and the Sri Lankans were reluctant to share their knowledge.

The Revenue Register of 1599[11] highlights the Salagama's role in the cinnamon trade, collecting and paying tribute to the king. This documentation, along with Chandra R. de Silva's work[12] underscores the significant economic contributions and privileges granted to the Salagama caste during colonial times.

60.4.6 Colonial Policies and Social Structures

The Portuguese colonial period, from the 1590s to 1658, was marked by significant disruptions, warfare, and social upheaval. According to Roberts[13], the Portuguese often disregarded local customs, which opened opportunities for non-Goyigama individuals and families to ascend socially. In contrast, the Dutch implemented a more orderly administration that maintained existing customs but occasionally bent traditions favoring the Salagama, crucial to the cinnamon industry.

Roberts' analysis indicates that the Dutch colonial policies were instrumental in carving out a distinct social and economic niche for the Salagama caste. The Dutch incentivized the Salagama to expand cinnamon plantations, resulting in significant economic prosperity and social elevation for the caste. This policy created a privileged position for the Salagama within the colonial economy and society.

60.4.7 Economic Incentives and Social Mobility

The economic policies of the Dutch VOC facilitated the integration and upward mobility of the Salagama caste. As noted by M. U. De Silva[14], the Dutch encouraged the Salagama to plant cinnamon on a large scale, offering them land and privileges. This policy boosted the cinnamon industry and entrenched the Salagama caste as a significant economic force.

The Dutch policy incentivized Salagama headmen to expand their plantations and accumulate wealth. This economic prosperity was accompanied by social elevation, as Salagama headmen received titles, gold chains, and medals for their successful efforts in the cinnamon industry. This created a distinct social class within the Salagama caste, marked by economic wealth and social prestige.

60.4.8 Social Integration and Cultural Exchange

The Karava and Salagama castes and other immigrant groups, such as the Durava, were gradually integrated into Singhalese society. The Janavamsa, a poem from around 1400, indicates that these castes were considered Singhalese, suggesting early and successful integration. The shared cultural and economic interests of these groups facilitated this integration.

Roberts[15] describes how the Portuguese and Goan missionaries successfully converted many Karava to Christianity, further aiding their integration.

The Christianization of the Karava began in India, and many Karava arrivals during the Portuguese period were already Christian. Mass conversions, such as the conversion of over 70000 Karava in 1556, as documented by Fernao de Queiroz[16] and Tikiri Abeyasinghe[17], highlight the extent of this religious transformation.

The arrival of the Portuguese and establishing colonial rule created new opportunities for social mobility and integration. The Portuguese favored importing caste members from friendly Indian territories to develop better relationships in Sri Lanka. This facilitated the integration of various castes, including the Karava and Salagama, both prominent in coastal regions.

60.4.9 Ancestral Names of Karava

Most family names of the Karava caste are referred to as 'ge-names' because they end with -ge. Perera[18] explains that this -ge signifies Gehi and not the genitive form, which also ends with -ge. He asserts that -ge translates to 'the House of,' a view shared by other scholars in this field.

Identifying a clan based on their house would have been convenient if the reference was to that specific house. This identifier could have described the house's physical appearance, its associated profession, or its location related to the village name. If -ge indeed stands for 'house' and not a genitive, then the ge-name initially served as an identifier rather than a family name. Thus, individuals with the same ge-name are not necessarily blood-related. However, given the historically limited mobility in Sri Lanka, there has been a higher likelihood of intra-village marriages. This suggests that people with ancestors from the same location may be blood-related and share a ge name.

60.4.10 Karava and Salagama Customs

Several traditional customs of the family of Shirani are common to the Karava caste, and many are also found among the Salagama caste, making them difficult to distinguish. For simplicity, these will be referred to as 'Karava customs.' A Portuguese manuscript from the early 1600s notes that the Karava preferred death over forsaking their traditions in birth, marriage, or death rituals. Examples of these customs are detailed below.

60.4.10.1 Karava and Salagama Births and Upbringing

Upon birth, astrologers are consulted to determine the first letter of the child's given names. The ge-name precedes these names and, if applicable, is followed by a Portuguese title. A Pancha-Uda, a gold coin depicting the five weapons of Lord Vishnu, is used to ornament the child for protection.

The child's first writing lesson, an auspicious custom, is given by an educated family member, symbolizing the introduction of a wise mentor.

Additionally, upon a girl's first menstruation, it is customary in the Karava caste to seclude her from male adults until a ceremony is held in her honor.

60.4.10.2 Karava and Salagama Weddings

In 1988, in Anuradhapura, as illustrated in Figure 60.4, the author's foster father, Pierre Vangheluwe, experienced a heat stroke, as described in Chapter 69.11. Contributing factors included smoking, sleep deprivation, dehydration, extensive travel, and the sweltering weather of Northern Sri Lanka. The episode occurred during dinner; he suddenly became bewildered, had slurred speech, and an accelerated heart rate. Despite blocked roads due to the Tamil Tigers' conflict with the Sri Lankan army, we navigated to a hospital where he received appropriate treatment. The hospital environment was dire, filled with severely injured patients and the overwhelming smell of blood and pus. Once stable, he insisted on returning to the hotel (Tissawewa Resthouse). He gradually recovered and later, in Belgium, was found to have had a minor heart attack. He fully recovered but passed away three years later from unrelated health issues. The author's last visit with him to Sri Lanka was in 1988, though the author returned in 1997 to marry his wife.

Marriages on the Indian subcontinent are arranged based on suitable partners considering horoscopes, caste, profession, and other factors.

Horoscopes also determine the wedding date. A wedding starts with the groom being served milk by his mother before he departs for the bride's house. Upon arrival, he is welcomed by younger female relatives who wash his feet and sing. A respected family member conducts the ceremony, tying the couple's fingers and pouring water over them, symbolizing unity. The couple exchanges golden rings, and the groom symbolically drapes the bride with the wedding saree and a white cloth. The couple distributes betel leaves to family members and lights a traditional pahanne lamp. The bride wears the Sri-Bo-Male, a necklace worn by Karava brides and royals. Photographs of various marriage rituals are shown in Figures 60.5 and 60.6.

60.4.10.3 Karava and Salagama Funerals

Funeral scenes are depicted in Figure 60.8. A Karava or Salagama funeral procession is led by traditional drummers, recognized by their white cloths and flags. Historically, a service caste performed the drumming. Nowadays, except for the Karava, other castes proceed to the cemetery without drummers. When present, drummers in Karava or Salagama processions cover their drums to muffle the sound. Drummers arrive hours before the procession's departure and frequently play funeral beats. If cremation is chosen, drummers stay overnight at the pyre, playing traditional beats.

Unlike other castes who abstain from cooking until the funeral is over, Karava and Salagama families cook and feed friends visiting for the funeral, excluding fried foods. After burial or cremation, attendees return for a communal meal. Alms are given to priests on the 7th day, three months later, and annually, as shown in Figures 60.9 and 60.10.

Families conscious of their Karava heritage may incorporate royal symbols such as the White (Pearl) umbrella (Mutu kuda), a sword, or a trident into the funeral.

Flags may display typical Karava symbols like the sun and moon. However, most Karava and Salagama families prioritize their Sri Lankan identity over caste, focusing more on religious than caste-ceremonial aspects. The funeral procession typically forms a long line as the body is transported from the home to the burial site.

Chapter 61

Uduwara: the Ancestral Village of Shirani de Silva in Sri Lanka

61.1 Introduction

The history of the village of Uduwara in Sri Lanka is rooted in its ancestral connections to Goa, India. There are three primary routes to reach Uduwara from Kalutara: traveling by boat along the Kalu Ganga River, taking the northern path via the right bank, and taking the southern path via the left bank. Alternatively, one can arrive from Horana or Ratnapura.

Despite the presence of a highway near Uduwara, the exit is relatively distant, requiring travelers to pass beneath the road before arriving in the village. The highway itself is situated approximately midway between Kalutara and Uduwara.

Upon arrival, Uduwara may initially seem unremarkable. However, it boasts a school, a post office, residences, rice fields, and a few small streets.

An aerial view reveals the village's unique topography, with hills such as Deewalkanda and the curving Kalu Ganga River placing Uduwara within a broader historical and geographical context. The village's historical significance is often overlooked by its inhabitants, as it receives no tourists or foreign visitors and lacks a local historical department.

There is only one primary school, and the villagers know little about Uduwara's history. They are more familiar with nearby towns such as Kalutara and Horana. The nearest police station is Anguruwathota, which offers a scenic river view.

Elderly residents and former priests once held a wealth of historical knowledge about Uduwara, which is now in scholarly texts and at prominent universities across the island.

Historically, the village was known for its cinnamon cultivation, which has since declined. Rice and tea remain prominent crops, though rubber cultivation, which gained significance in the latter half of the 20th century, has also waned. The village lacks medical facilities, necessitating trips to Galpatha, Anguruwathota, or Nagoda for healthcare.

Two significant landmarks in Uduwara are the remnants of a Portuguese chapel, Capela in Portuguese, now a cozy temple in the suburb still known as Kapuella, and the main village temple with a school across the street. These sites once formed the fortress of Uduwara, a fact evident in the site's construction, including the house with the heads, Olupathage, and the defense wall along the river.

Uduwara's proximity to the Kalu Ganga River offers a tempting invitation for a swim, particularly when the current is mild. However, it's important to exercise caution due to the potential presence of snakes and crocodiles. While swimming in the river's warm waters can be a romantic experience, it's crucial to note that swimming at the river's estuary in Kalutara is perilous.

Over the years, the riverbed has deepened due to sand dredging for the construction industry, reducing the frequency of floods in the rice fields.

Despite these challenges, Uduwara remains a relatively safe spot for swimming, offering a unique and inviting environment for residents and visitors alike.

61.2 The Geographic Situation

The ancient fortress of Uduwara, shown on a map in Figure 61.1, was located, where, in 1890, the temple Uduwara Shailatharama Maha Viharayaya was established. Constructing Buddhist temples on former fortresses is expected and frequently done because of the elevated ground and safety during flooding. The elevated field is still clearly visible, and so are the Portuguese buildings older than 1890.

The fortress was constructed on the right bank of the Kalu Ganga. Stairs led to the river as this was the only access because no roads or bridges existed.

The Portuguese built the fortress along the Kalu Ganga's straight navigable stretch near the place where the Kuda Ganga River joins the hardly navigable upstream Kalu Ganga River.

It served as an outpost for Kalutara and a trading spot from which goods were shipped to Kalutara.

As detailed in Chapter 54.5.23 - Chapter 54.10, the Asian chapter of the Iberian ancestors of Shirani de Silva commences with the momentous arrival of Juan Carvalho de Silva in Goa circa 1570. Accompanied by his uncle Pere de Silva y Rivera (Da Silva Ribeira), who also had ties to de Almeida, this marked the family's first step into the rich historical tapestry of Goa. Pere de Silva y Ribeira would serve as the Viceroy at Goa in his twilight years, from 1635 to 1639.

Juan Carvalho de Silva, a family scion, married a Luso-Indian in Goa, a testament to the family's diverse heritage. They had two sons, one of whom, Antonio, would leave a lasting mark in Sri Lanka.

Antonio, as depicted in Figure 61.2, would venture to Sri Lanka and play a pivotal role in establishing and defending a fortress at Uduwara around 1600. This fortress, a testament to the family's military prowess and strategic importance, was a reinforcement following the battle of Uduwara at Deewalkanda in 1595 (see also Chapter 56), which was initially constructed by Diego Samarakoon, brother of Fernando Samara de Cunha y Rala (Samarakoon), in 1596.

The battle of Deewalkanda in Uduwara, in 1595, was one to keep the armies of the neighboring Kingdom of Rayigam Chorale, led by Domingos Correa, also known as Edirimana Suriya Bandara and Appuhamy, from capturing the Royals from the Kingdom of Kotte. It was Diego Samara de Cunha y Rala (Diego Samarakoon), better known as Samarakoon and sometimes confused with his brother Fernando, a Singhalese with Portuguese ancestors, who could stop the Rayigam Chorale armies by launching an attack from the Deewalkanda hill at Uduwara.

The assault saved the royals and, therefore, the Kotte Kingdom.

The wooden construction at Uduwara remained weak as in 1596, Domingo Correa attacked Uduwara again in May. The attack was, however, unsuccessful whence he fled and hid somewhere near Uduwara. He was consequently handed over by an older woman, a local Achi, who had informed Samarakoon of his hiding place.

On July 14, 1596, Domingo Correa was executed in Colombo. His capture was highly applauded by King Felipe III of Spain (i.e., Felipe II of Portugal) in 1598, and he decided to invest more in the Kingdom of Kotte.

Don Carvalho de Silva would arrive in Sri Lanka from Goa during this policy. A stone fort was constructed on the Kalu Ganga at Uduwara in the early 1600s. The buildings inside the fortress may have been built somewhat later, however. These constructions were made for trade and for gunpowder fabrication, such as the Olupath house, from which the family would receive its Karava-style

Sri Lankan family name in addition to their Iberian 'de Silva' name.

The fact that Antonio Carvalho de Silva constructed the fortress is also read on page 149 in O. M. da Silva Cosme's book[1].

On page 176, O. M. da Silva Cosme describes Antonio de Silva, an army captain who died in December 1614, along with Vincent Rodrigues, a former captain of Balana, in Chapter 56, and resident of Colombo. It took place in a campaign against Kandy, at Maturata, on the way to Badulla. The following year, a punitive expedition occurred to Thumpana, also in Chapter 56, in August 1615 under captain Major Pero Peixo da Silva.

We remind the reader that the story in Sri Lanka, related to the Carvalho de Silva family and the construction of a fortress in Uduwara, came after the life of Joao de Barros (1496-1570) and, therefore, after the descriptions in the famous book series 'Decadas da Asia.'

Nevertheless, those books show that family members were involved very early on in the conquest of India and Ceilao, exposed in Figure 61.3, and further below.

A search through the entire book series 'Decadas da Asia,' by Joao de Barros (1496-1570), delivers an extensive list of persons named da Silva or de Silva and Carvalho. Note that Barros always applies the Portuguese spelling, even if it concerns men from Spain or Spanish ancestors; therefore, 'da Silva,' in many cases, was 'de Silva.' The series covers the period when Jorge Cabral and Vasco da Gama were involved. Nevertheless, it shows that even early on, many de Silvas and Carvalhos were involved in India and Sri Lanka, some of whom were very likely related.

In particular, those men were captains or knights in the early days. Later, we should also consider the arrivals of merchants, government officials, and even religious priests. Here is the list in the spelling as used by Barros in his books 'Decadas da Asia':

Aires da Silva, Aires Gomes da Silva, Antonio da Silva, Antonio da Silva de Menezes, Antonio Gomes da Silva, Antonio Moniz da Silva, Ayres da Silva, Ayres Gomes da Silva, Balthazar da Silva, Braz da Silva, Correa da Silva, D. Bernardo da Silva, D. Pedro da Silva, D. Pedro da Silva da Gama, D. Rodrigo da Silva, Diogo da Silva, Diogo Gomes da Silva, Dona Leonor da Silva, Duarte da Silva, Fernao da Silva, Francisco da Silva, Francisco da Silva de Menezes, Francisco Ferreira da Silva, Gaspar da Silva, Gomez da Silva, Joao da Silva, Joao da Silva Barreto, Joao da Silva Pereira, Joao de Mello da Silva, Joao Gomes da Silva, Jorge da Silva, Luiz da Silva, Luiz de Mello da Silva, Manoel Carvalho de Oliveira, Manoel da Silva, Manoel de Almeida da Silva, Manuel da Silva, Martim Correa da Silva, Pedro da Silva, Pedro da Silva de Menezes, Pedro da Silva Modeliar, Pedro Peixoto da Silva, Pero da Silva, Ruy Pereira da Silva, Tristao da Silva, Vasco da Silva, Aleixo Carvalho, Alvaro Carvalho, Alvaro de Carvalho, Antonio Carvalho, Antonio Carvalho de Araujo, Belchior Carvalho, Bernadim de Carvalho, Carlos Carvalho, Domingos Carvalho, Farnao Carvalho, Fernao Rodrigues de Carvalho, Filippe de Carvalho, Garcia de Carvajal, Gaspar de Carvalho, Gil Fernandes de Carvalho, Gomez Carvalho, Jeronymo Carvalho, Joao Carvalho, Joao Lopes Carvalho, Joao Rodrigues de Carvalho, Joao Rodrigues Salema de Carvalho, Lourenço Carvalho, Lourenço de Carvalho, Luiz Carvalho, Luiz Rodrigues de Carvalho, Macedo de Carvalho, Miguel Carvalho, Pedro Carvalho, Pedro Fernandes de Carvalho, Pero Fernandes de Carvalho, Ruy Carvalho, Vasco de Carvalho, and Vicente Carvalho.

A less extensive coverage of the early decades of the Portuguese in India and Sri Lanka can also be read in 'Lendas da India,' by Gaspar Correia (1492-1563). His book shows very few de Silva and Carvalho persons:

Antonio Nunes de Carvalho, Rebello da Silva, Lourenço da Silva, Joao Pedroso Gomes da Silva, and Bràs da Silva.

61.4 An Archeological investigation of the Fortress of Uduwara

61.4.1 Similarities with Other Portuguese Colonial Mansions and Homes

The Olupathage de Silva family's ancestral house was the fortress of Uduwara on the Kalu Ganga River. An impression is shown in Figure 61.4.

The original architecture of the buildings inside the fort, such as the Gothic entrance bow (clearly Iberian) and the head sculptures on the walls, are not just architectural marvels but also significant historical artifacts. The Gothic entrance, though it may appear modern, is likely an original feature that was preserved during refurbishment. The other formation with the head sculptures is Portuguese.

To compare, one may look at Colonial homes and buildings in Mannar, Goa, Zanzibar, Angola, Timor, etc. Comparative impressions as introduction are shown in Figures 61.5 and 61.6.

61.4.2 Its Strategic Location along the Kalu Ganga River

To appreciate the location of the Uduwara fortress, we show Figures 61.7 and 61.8. Figure 61.31 shows an impression in times of conflict.

61.4.3 Fortress Wall Remains and Access to Kalu Ganga River

Important remains are depicted in Figures 61.9, 61.10 and 61.11.

61.4.4 The House of the Heads: a Polyvalent Building for Governance, Trade and a Gunpowder Factory

A satellite view reveals that the building has a cross shape, which is misleading as it consists of two parts. The front section (East side) is an ornamented construction that looks like an official building. The local Portuguese authorities probably used it for governance purposes.

Attached is a robust rectangular construction where the gunpowder[3] mill was located, possibly driven by cattle.

This square construction has three branches that may have served as living places or storage facilities. The square with the three components and the front building forms a cross.

The reader may also be interested in comparing with Chapter 56.6.9, the fortress of Colombo.

Note that the cross of the Order of Christ has been a national emblem of Portugal since Manuel I's reign (1469-1521). Although it does not appear on Portugal's coat of arms, it is frequently used as a national symbol. For instance, it was used in the sails of the Portuguese ships that discovered India and Sri Lanka, and it can still be found today in the sails of the Portuguese navy's school ship, Sagres.

A reference picture is shown in Figure 61.13, followed by an overview of the Uduwara fortress site in Figures 61.14 and 61.15, anteceded by a Portuguese military reference, equally in Figure 61.15.

Many books have been written about the fabrication of gunpowder. Here we refer to an article by Brenda J. Buchanan[4]. Another example is a book by Jack Kelly[5], while in Figure 61.12, we have shown an old recipe.

To summarise, the best quality gunpowder, i.e., black powder, is as follows.

Charcoal is to be fabricated first, which is done by burning wood without oxygen, preferably willow, alder, buckthorn, or cottonwood. We assume that the Portuguese also experimented with other timber in Sri Lanka and India. The other ingredient is Potassium Nitrate (Saltpetre), which is needed to provide oxygen during the chemical reaction. The last element is, of course, Sulfur. The role of Sulfur is to provide the fuel for the explosion while also lowering the temperature to ignite the mixture.

The proportions are the order of magnitude of 75% Potassium Nitrate, 15% charcoal, and 10% Sulfur. This mixture only becomes black powder if it is very closely blended. That is a double problem. First, it must be ground for many hours to get a fine paste. Then, one must ensure that it remains balanced during transportation. The latter was hardly possible, so it was customarily fabricated at the place of usage, i.e., inside the fortress.

To grind gunpowder, one must ensure that no sparks occur because these could be dangerous and cause explosions. The most widely adopted method uses an edge-runner mill, such as the one found in Uduwara and shown in Figure 61.16.

Milling black powder was done by a marble or limestone millstone on a limestone bed. Later, cast iron wheels were also used on an iron bed. Before the limestone millstone, a rotating ball mill made of bronze or lead (to avoid sparks) was also used.

61.4.4.1 Ornaments

61.4.4.2 East Sside Ornament Revealing a Seat of Governance

Swans, shown in Figure 61.21, are used as ornaments on the building. The use of swans as decorations was prevalent around 1600 in Portugal. For instance, 27 swans are painted in the Palacio Nacional de Sintra, outside Lisboa in Portugal, in Renaissance-style wooden caskets decorated with white swans in different positions, with inverted crown-shaped tips. The swans were also mentioned by the poet Luís Pereira Brandao around 1570. The appearance of Knight-like figures in Figure 61.22 indicates that the fortress must have been a local seat of power.

In the fortress center is the Olupathage house, oriented in the NWSE direction, contrary to the other buildings around. There was a typical square in the fortress that was directed likewise. The cross-shaped structure resembles the governor's home at the Fortress of Graça in Elvas, Portugal. The gunpowder mill was in the middle of the fortress. Given that it reached the Kalu Ganga River, it must also have gone North beyond the area where there is a school at Uduwara. Indeed, in and around the school where Shirani de Silva received her early education, it is known that ancient constructions were located until the 1990s.*

61.4.4.3 The Other Walls Depict the Story of the Arrival of the de Silva Family from Goa, Symbolized by an Abundance of Head-Shaped Figurines

Besides the depiction of the seat of governance, there are also depictions of what happened before this, in Figures 61.23, 61.24 and 61.25. The unique and intriguing use of head figures, hence the term Olu in Olupathage, is prominently shown in Figures 61.26, 61.27, 61.28, 61.29 and 61.30, along with comparisons of style with Goa. It is particularly clear that the use of heads in Uduwara, on civil buildings, even exceeded the frequent appearance on religious constructions in Goa.

61.5 Style of the Sculptures on the House of the Heads

The artistic ornaments at Uduwara in Sri Lanka present a fascinating amalgamation of cultural and historical influences, particularly evident in the sculptural decorations. At the foundational levels of the construction, human heads, or Olu, are prominently featured, while the upper tiers are adorned with lion heads. This stratified arrangement symbolizes the heritage and hierarchical significance attributed to the first Carvalho de Silva family, who constructed the house. They ingeniously incorporated the traditional symbols of Olupathage (human heads) and augmented them with lion heads, signifying the de Silva family's emblem (the crowned Lion). The inclusion of a rose motif further signifies the Carvalho lineage.

Detailed illustrations and further exposition can be found in Chapter 61.4.4.1, Figures 54.44, 61.2, 61.20, 61.24, and 61.25. A thorough examination of the hairstyles depicted in the sculptures, collectively referred to as Olupathage (or Olu-Path-ge or Olu-Path-geddara), reveals significant insights into their chronological context.

The sculpted hairstyles are reminiscent of those found in the artworks of Caravaggio (1571-1610), characterized by their looser, less constrained appearance, which contrasts with the more confined and neat hairstyles depicted in Michelangelo's works (1475-1564). Caravaggio's period, often considered a more 'bohemian' era compared to the Renaissance austerity of Michelangelo, aligns well with the hair styling observed in Uduwara's sculptures.

This stylistic analysis is further corroborated by comparisons to the naturalistic yet slightly wilder hairstyles of Bernini's sculptures (1598-1680), as depicted in Figure 61.32. These comparisons suggest that the sculptures at Uduwara likely date back to around 1600, concurrent with the early Portuguese settlements along the Kalu Ganga, including Uduwara. While signs of repair and potential replacements are evident, the overall stylistic integrity points to this early 17th-century origin.

Chapter 61.4.4.3 further elucidates the stylistic parallels between the sculptured heads at Uduwara and those found at the Church of Bom Jesus in Goa, India. This comparative analysis is not just a side note, but a crucial part of our research. It underscores the cultural and historical linkages between the two sites, providing a broader context for understanding the artistic and architectural exchanges within the region during the period of Portuguese influence. This broader context is essential for fully grasping the significance of our findings and their implications.

61.6 Other Remaining Constructions on the Site

Most buildings on this site are either Portuguese or have been constructed similarly. Note the building next to the cross-like one where the Google Maps® label Uduwara Sri Sailatalarama Maha point points. This temple uses the facade of a Portuguese church. At some point in history, probably when the VOC controlled the area, and Catholics were forced to convert to Protestantism or Buddhism, the church must have been used for different purposes or was even destroyed. The facade remained, and Roman Catholic signs were removed. Nowadays, the facade shows the British heraldic symbols of the lion with the unicorn and others. The sun, the moon, and a temple are more challenging signs to interpret in their historical context. We assume that the sun was there originally. The other symbols were added later during the many conversions from the Roman Catholic church to perhaps an administrative building during the British era and then to a Buddhist temple.

Interestingly, the church's facade reveals the original church's unique architectural features. The facade is in the SSE direction,

Figure 61.9: This is a compilation of images taken at the fortress of Uduwara. Towards the river is a modern staircase that dates back to around 1900, when the fortress became a Buddhist temple. Before this, there may have been stairs or just a pathway. More critical is the remaining fortress wall, which the Portuguese constructed. The corner of the fortress with access to the Kalu Ganga is still splendid. As the water level depends on the season, the access platform on which the wall is built is sometimes immersed. Also, the remaining wall is still remarkable. One can also see that Carvalho de Silva built the fort on elevated ground. Granite foundation stones have also been used to pave the ground for stability during the war and trade during the Portuguese and later the VOC period. The author's daughter's shoes are shown in one of the photos to get a sense of the size of the granite foundation stones used for the construction. (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive) meaning the altar is pointed in the NNW direction. So one was facing the sun on the front if one was standing South and watching in the NNW direction. Note that the churches in Sri Lanka and India do not typically point in a specified orientation as they often do in Europe (regularly looking East).

The NNW direction is the direction to Goa in India, where the Portuguese extit 'Basílica do Bom Jesus' is located having an altar with a large sun sculpture above, as seen in the image below. This unique architectural feature adds to the fascination of this historical site.

61.6.1 The Gate at Uduwara to resemble Goa

At Goa, an arch, in Figure 61.33, marks the entrance to the city from the river. Before the Portuguese arrived, an arch was already called the Adil Shah arch. It marked the entrance from the river to the Palace of Adil Shah. The Portuguese used the palace of Shah Adil as the governors' residence until 1695, but it was, for an unknown reason, demolished by the government in 1820. The Portuguese built the Viceroy's arch in 1599 to substitute that of Adil Shah. Also, at Uduwara, they made an arch that one had to pass through after ascending from the Kalu Ganga River bank. Uduwara served as a small copy of Goa.

The Viceroy's arch in Figure 61.33 was built in 1599 to mark Goa's Portuguese conquest by Governor Francisco da Gama in memory of his great-grandfather Vasco da Gama. On the riverside is a statue of Vasco da Gama; on the rear side is a statue of Santa Catarina.

It is speculated that the building adorned with the Salagama symbols was embellished at the onset of the VOC period with these symbols to signify to the Dutch that the village was Salagama and met the monopoly for Cinnamon trade as imposed by the VOC. In essence, it was a display of status and concealment of their Karava origins, as being considered Karavas at that time would have been detrimental to their business. It's worth noting that the Sun and Moon ornaments, also found at Goa, as depicted in Figures 61.34 and 61.35, further underscore the architectural similarities between Uduwara and Goa.

A more detailed examination of the Uduwara arch is presented in Figures 61.34, 61.35, 61.36 and 61.37.

61.6.2 Other Noteworthy items

Other noteworthy items found on the Uduwara fortress site are shown in Figures 61.38, 61.39, 61.40 and 61.41.

61.7 Remaining Portuguese houses nearby

In the village of Uduwara, in between modern homes, one can still find several Portuguese-style homes, some of which may be hundreds of years old. The colonial past can always be sensed. Impressions and comparisons are shown in Figures 61.41, 61.43, 61.42 and 61.44.

Figure 61.16: In the middle of the gunpowder building in Uduwara (Sri Lanka, 2019), shown in the two upper left photos, there is a stage with a post that reaches the ceiling. This has functioned as a human or animal-driven grinding mill (also known as the Roman Mill), which has been well-known since the Roman period. The workers, the horse, cow, or donkey, would have walked on the stage floor, and in the middle, held by the metal post, would have been a vertical grinding wheel, spinning around a horizontal axis attached to and rotating around the metal post. The system is still used in rural areas in India. It may also have been a Moorish mill with a conical grinding stone, yet it was found in Spain (e.g., Millstone Oil Mill Alcazar Jerez de la Frontera Cadiz Andalucia Spain) and Morocco. In particular, the axis is held in place by the roof and the floor, around which a mill ran to make gunpowder. The sheer height provided sufficient fresh air to prevent dangerous fumes from building up during the long grinding process. The figure also shows a drawing of a horse-driven gunpowder mill. The horses marched on the floor on a stage around the mill's vertical rotation axis, which had two vertical millstones. The model was used in the 17th century in the Spanish Netherlands (Belgium) and the Dutch States (The Netherlands). It created a tight melange of the ingredients used to make gunpowder by vertical millstones on a horizontal surface. Humans, animals, or by wind or water drove it. 🅮 Furthermore, photos are shown, taken in Goa in 2019, of millstone remains of a large gunpowder mill setup at the archaeological museum of Goa. The reconstruction is inaccurate as the solid rectangular wooden beams could never allow the stones to rotate, neither around their axis nor the central axis. Another view of the site is shown in Figure 61.16. Finally, an ancient drawing of a water-driven Blackpowder mill is equally shown (Courtesy of Villorio Zonca, 'Novo Teatro de machine et edifice,' 17th century 🅮*). Figure 61.22: A knight-like figure at the top of the front wall is still clearly visible. Perhaps this acted as a 'Solar.' Nevertheless, the central figure is equal to one of the sons, Antonio, of Juan Carvalho de Silva, who was found in Goa. (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.23: This image depicts the battle of Deewalkanda at Uduwara in 1595. The masked person represents the warriors of Rayigam Chorale, such as 'Correa,' while the person 'jumping' or 'running' off the hill to fight them was Samara de Coon y Rala, better known as 'Samarakoon.' At first sight, Samarakoon may be regarded by the spectator as a child because of the proportion of his head to his body. However, we know from Chapter 57.10 and from P.E. Peiris's work[2], that Samarakoon had a large head and was famous for it. A sculptor would, therefore, purposely expose this to clarify the identity of his artistic subject. (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.25: This image shows Dom Carvalho de Silva confronting and negotiating with the Kotte Kingdom's enemies, such as the warriors of Rayigam Chorale, depicted by a masked man. It represents the battle between the Portuguese and the Singhalese, which occurred before constructing the fortress of Uduwara. The person exposing a finger is again a son of Juan Carvalho de Silva, and the same is the one depicted in Goa. Note that the tree behind Dom Carvalho de Silva is, in fact, an oak tree and symbolizes his name, 'Carvalho.' The Lion heads stand for 'de Silva.' The rose below each lion sculpture symbolizes the heraldic shield of 'Carvalho.' (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.26: Head ornaments are found everywhere on the construction at the fortress of Uduwara. A couple of heads have been refurbished. Still, most are original and slightly worn by weather and history. Several layers of paint have protected the original heads against South-West Sri Lanka's tropical climate. The fortress of Uduwara looks like little Portugal. (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.36: The old church facade is an architectural entity separated from the later constructed building. Likely, the top carried a cross, and most symbols on the facade were added after the Portuguese rule to meet its new functionalities. Nowadays, the restored and beautifully gilded top of the old church's facade shows the likely British heraldic symbols of the Lion with the Unicorn - very likely, a heraldic shield of the British was placed between them - together with the (probably original) sun and moon, which are Salagama symbols, but also appear at Goa, as shown in Figures 61.34 and 61.35, and pagoda with oars, Salagama too. A closer look at the facade of the old church reveals that the entrance is Iberian. The figure above the entrance likely depicts the person who established the first church. (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.37: The arch, situated in the top-left corner, is a captivating feature found within the fortress of Uduwara. It stands as the remnants of a former church or chapel, with only the gate, serving as a facade, remaining intact. A new construction has been erected behind it. The distinct shape of the arch, a testament to its Iberian origins, is a fascinating detail. The building, in its excellent condition, was originally a Roman Catholic Church. It was later converted and partially reconstructed into an administrative building during the British era, adding another layer to its historical narrative. For comparison, a selection of other arches is shown. The Ajimez-window in Valencia (before 1500), of which the outer arch is pure Gothic and appears in the Portuguese flag castles, while the Moors influence the inner arch, clearly an Iberian and even Portuguese style. We also show arches in Venice, Italy. Interestingly, a comparison with one of three examples of ossuaries at Montblanc (Spain) is possible, where the same arch is used as in Uduwara. It concerns the Ossera de la abadessa Constança de Llobets, inside the church of Santa Maria de la Serra. Also fascinating to compare is the Monserrate Palace at Sintra in Portugal, which has bows similar to those in Uduwara everywhere. We see such bows inside the palace, but the gates to go outside also have them. The castle has a long history, and the architecture is eclectic. Nevertheless, modern construction, as can be seen, dates back to the 19th century only. However, it was inspired by ancient Portuguese structures influenced by Islam until the 11th century.[6] (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.40: Several granite pillars are found on the site, remnants of an older construction, probably from the Portuguese period. The carved ornament is significantly different from other posts found in Sri Lanka. It's not the exact parallelogram often found in Iberia or Goa, but it's probably inspired by it. Posts in Goa and a fountain in Spain are also compared. (Sri Lanka and Goa, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.41: We get a view of the fortress from the street. The fort is very clearly an old Portuguese village. The British paved the road and would not have crossed the fort during the Portuguese era, but it was an access road to the settlement. The yellowish building in this picture, located on the west side of the fortress, in between new constructions, is Portuguese. Besides the triangular neo-classical shapes, the appearance of corner reinforcement stones is also typically European. We can also observe a bell tower is located on the site. Its architecture looks different from the rest of the site. Therefore, it was constructed either at the end of the Portuguese period, the VOC period, or perhaps the British or later. An attempt was made to fit into the site's style, but one must find a way to eliminate the differences. (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.43: The old house of Olupathage Peiris de Silva, Shirani's grandfather, at Uduwara, near the former Portuguese Chapel 'Kapuella' and within walking distance from the former Portuguese fortress. The picture was taken in 1997. Unfortunately, the house was destroyed in 2002. Note that the pillars are ornamented almost equal to the granite ones found at the Uduwara fortress. Also, a Swastika symbol was engraved on the outer wall and was overpainted (hardly visible in the image). This Roman symbol, which also appears in Spain, may have been a tradition since the early settlers in Uduwara, as described elsewhere. Although it's also a symbol in India's Arian cultures, it's typically only applied to temples, not homes. (Sri Lanka, 1997) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 61.44: Uduwara, the house, and the patio exude colonial charm. In this tranquil setting, Sri Lankans often enjoy Arack, a traditional local spirit accompanied by 'tapas'—a custom likely inherited from Portuguese colonial influences. In this context, the term 'tapas' may refer to a variety of small dishes, similar to the Spanish tradition where 'tapas' are small appetizers or snacks typically served with drinks. In Portugal, these small plates are known as 'petiscos' and are enjoyed similarly. The integration of this cultural practice illustrates the blending of culinary traditions brought about by historical colonial exchanges. (Sri Lanka, 2019) (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Richmond Castle at Kalutara

62.1 Introduction

The name and DNA analysis on relatives show that Appuhamilage Arthur de Silva, who constructed this charming castle on the Kalu Ganga River at Kalutara, is a distant blood-relative of Shirani de Silva. Although it concerns a small court, despite what local guides tend to claim, it’s ideally located on the river’s left bank, where it catches a sweet ocean breeze and offers a beautiful inland view. The court requires urgent professional restoration, while a stylish additional construction should be built as a cafeteria for visitors. It’s a place of potential, but we noticed that, in 2019, it was disintegrating.

62.2 Appuhamilage Arthur de Silva Constructed It

Figure 62.1: Richmond Castle, built by Arthur de Silva in Kalutara in 2019, is in an excellent location and splendid architecture. Apart from the Lion, the symbol of ’de Silva,’ a Victorian staircase, and a ventilation system adjusted to the tropical climate are also present. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

The reader can find in Part XV that Shirani de Silva is blood-related to A. Arthur de Silva. In particular, a blood relationship between Shirani de Silva and this N. D. A. Silva Wijayasinghe is proven in Chapter 74 about autosomal DNA-analysis (39 centiMorgans in common, 9494 matching SNP’s).

With its Majestic view of the river, shown in Figure 62.2, the castle was constructed between the former Fortress of Kalutara and Uduwara, along the Kalu Ganga. It was erected by Appuhamilage Arthur de Silva, also known as Nanayakkara Rajawasala Appuhamilage Don Arthur de Silva Wijesinghe Siriwardana or as N. D. A. Silva Wijayasinghe. He was born on November 12, 1889 or 1888, at Kollupitiya and died childless on July 8, 1947, at Kandy. He was the Padikara Mudaliar of Kalutara and was educated at St. Thomas College in England. The castle was first used in 1910. The small villa has 16 rooms, 99 doors, and 38 windows.

Arthur de Silva was married in 1910 to Clarice Matilda Maude Suriyabandara. His father was Paulis de Silva. His grandfather was N. D. P. de Silva; his grandmother was Dona Isabella de Silva, who passed away on November 17, 1822, at 56. When Arthur de Silva passed away in 1947, he was buried at the Colombo General Cemetry of Borella. The grave states:

’To the memory of Grand Chevalier N. D. A. de Silva Wijayasinghe, the Padika Mudliyer, Knight Grand Commander of the Holy Sepulchre order, Knight Grand Commander of the Order of St Sylvester.’

The grave is indicated as ’Grant Nr 188/499, Location 2 PC 14, Number 247647, date 10.7.1947, Name N. W. A. de Silva Wijaysinghe, date of birth 8.7.1947, receipt nr 2685, age 59, occupation Padikara Mudali, Roman Catholic RC Section.’ Being of a noble and wealthy family, Arthur and his brother studied in Great Britain. He became a friend of the Maharaja of Ramnad. After the studies, he visited the Maharaja, was quite impressed by his friend’s mansion, and expressed his interest in building a look-alike in Sri Lanka. Upon arriving in Sri Lanka, Arthur was appointed the ’Head of Mudaliyars’ of the Kalutara region. There were 12

Being a Christian, the marriage occurred at the Infant Jesus Church in Kalamulla, Kalutara.
Personalities and events in the life of Arthur de Silva are shown in Figures 62.3 and 62.4.

62.3 The British Presence in India and Sri Lanka

To understand why Appuhamilage Arthur de Silva would have constructed a typical British colonial mansion in the early 1900s while Sri Lanka was, as a matter of fact, occupied by the British, a little bit of history is required in which one should distinguish the early British rule through the East India Company and the later rule through the Crown.
The British presence in India began with the establishment of the East India Company (EIC) in the early 17th century. Chartered by Queen Elizabeth I in 1600, the EIC was initially a commercial entity focused on trade, particularly in spices, silk, cotton, tea, and opium. Over time, however, the EIC transitioned from a trading company to a powerful political entity, establishing control over large swathes of the Indian subcontinent.

62.3.1 The East India Company and Its Rule

A combination of military conquest and political manipulation marked the EIC's dominance. The company secured control over Bengal, Bihar, and Orissa through victories in key battles such as the Battle of Plassey (1757) and the Battle of Buxar (1764). This era saw the implementation of policies that heavily favored British economic interests, often to the detriment of local economies and populations. The EIC established a complex system of administration and taxation, often employing brutal methods to extract revenue.
The company's administration, however, was marred by widespread corruption, inefficiency, and exploitation. Famines, such as the Great Bengal Famine of 1770, exacerbated by mismanagement, resulted in the deaths of millions. The company's oppressive policies and disregard for local customs and traditions eventually culminated in the Indian Rebellion of 1857, mentioned in Figure 62.5. This uprising, also known as the Sepoy Mutiny, was a significant turning point, revealing the profound discontent among various sections of Indian society.

62.3.2 Transition to Crown Rule

The rebellion prompted the British Crown to reevaluate its relationship with India. Recognizing the need for a more stable and humane governance structure, Queen Victoria issued the Royal Proclamation of 1858, which marked the dissolution of the EIC and the transfer of its powers to the British Crown. This proclamation promised to respect the rights of Indian princes, acknowledge the importance of Indian traditions and customs, and ensure justice and equality under British law.
Under Crown rule, India was administered directly by the British government, with a Viceroy representing the monarch. As this period of direct governance was known, the British Raj lasted until India's independence in 1947. The Raj brought significant infrastructural developments, such as expanding the railway network, establishing telegraph lines, and improving irrigation. However, British economic policies prioritized British interests, leading to exploitation and underdevelopment in many sectors of the Indian economy.

62.3.3 British Rule in Sri Lanka: A Separate Entity

The EIC's role in Sri Lanka was mainly as an agent of the British Crown during the initial takeover from the Dutch. However, the governance of Ceylon quickly transitioned to direct Crown control rather than being administered by the EIC. By 1802, following the Treaty of Amiens, Ceylon was officially declared a British Crown colony, separate from British India, which remained under EIC control until 1858.
While India was the jewel in the Crown of the British Empire, Sri Lanka (then known as Ceylon) was treated as a separate colony. British control over Sri Lanka began in 1796, and by 1815, they had complete control following the defeat of the Kingdom of Kandy. Several factors contributed to the British decision to administer Sri Lanka separately from India:

62.3.3.0.1 Geopolitical and Strategic Considerations Sri Lanka's strategic position in the Indian Ocean made it a crucial point for maritime routes. The British maintained separate administrative control to ensure direct oversight of this vital location, essential for the protection of naval routes and for maintaining British naval dominance.

62.3.3.0.2 Economic Interests Sri Lanka's economy was primarily driven by plantation agriculture, particularly tea, coffee, and rubber. The British established a plantation economy that was distinct from the broader economic strategies applied in India. This specialization warranted a different administrative approach tailored to the unique economic activities of the island.

62.3.3.0.3 Cultural and Ethnic Diversity Sri Lanka had a distinct cultural and ethnic composition, with significant differences from mainland India. The British administration recognized these differences and opted for a separate colonial administration to better manage the local population and mitigate potential conflicts.

62.3.3.0.4 Colonial Administration Efficiency Administering Sri Lanka as a separate entity allowed for more focused governance. The British aimed to implement policies specific to the local context, facilitating more effective control and exploitation of resources.

62.3.4 Richmond Castle Expressed Harmony

The British administration in India and Sri Lanka differed significantly due to various strategic, economic, and cultural factors. Unlike India, Sri Lanka had not suffered unt he the East Indian Company and was, therefore, less hostile towards the British. The EIC's initial rule in India set the stage for British colonial governance, characterized by economic exploitation and administrative control, which continued under the British Raj. In contrast, Sri Lanka's separate colonial administration reflected the British emphasis on strategic maritime control and the unique economic model of plantation agriculture. These differences underscored the British's varied approaches to maintaining their empire across different regions, adapting to local conditions to maximize their colonial objectives. Ceylon, while being the jewel of the British Crown, was a sweet spot for constructing a Richmond Castle by a Sri Lankan.

Lakshmibai, born Manikarnika Tambe on November 19, 1828, in Varanasi, India, was the queen consort of Jhansi and one of the most prominent figures in the Indian Rebellion of 1857. Known for her courage, strategic acumen, and leadership, she became a symbol of resistance against British colonial rule. In 1842, she married Maharaja Gangadhar Rao Newalkar of Jhansi. After his death in 1853, under the Doctrine of Lapse, the British East India Company refused to recognize the Maharaja's adopted son, Damodar Rao, as the rightful heir and annexed Jhansi. Lakshmibai's refusal to cede Jhansi to British control led her to play a pivotal role in the rebellion.

When the uprising began in 1857, Rani Lakshmibai assumed a leading role, organizing her forces and successfully defending Jhansi against British attacks. However, the city fell to the British in 1858. She fled to Kalpi, joined forces with other rebels, and eventually regrouped in Gwalior. On June 18, 1858, during a fierce battle near Gwalior, Lakshmibai fought valiantly against the British forces. According to accounts, she was mortally wounded while leading her troops dressed as a cavalry leader. To prevent the British from capturing her body, she instructed a hermit to burn it. Her death marked a significant moment in the struggle for Indian independence.

The historical context of the battle in which Lakshmibai died is rooted in the wider Indian Rebellion of 1857, a major, unsuccessful uprising against British rule. The revolt had various underlying causes, including political, economic, and social grievances. Rani's leadership and valor made her an enduring symbol of resistance and an inspiration for future generations of Indian nationalists.

Right: Jhanis, 2023, the author, and Radha Charan Gupta, born in 1935 in Gursarai, Jhansi. Gupta is a distinguished Indian mathematics historian known for his extensive contributions to the field. An alumnus of the University of Lucknow, Gupta completed his bachelor's degree in 1955 and his master's degree in 1957. He earned his Ph.D. in the history of mathematics from Ranchi University in 1971, under the guidance of T.A. Sarasvati Amma. His academic career includes a professorship at Birla Institute of Technology, Mesra, where he served from 1958 until retirement in 1995 as Emeritus Professor of History of Mathematics and Logic.

Gupta is renowned for his work on Indian mathematical history, including studies on interpolation techniques and the works of mathematicians like Govindasvamin and Paramesvara. His notable publications include a comprehensive collection of his research papers titled Gaitānanda: Selected Works of Radha Charan Gupta on History of Mathematics.

Throughout his career, Gupta has received numerous accolades, including the prestigious Kenneth O. May Prize in 2009, making him the first Indian recipient of this honor. In 2023, the Government of India awarded him the Padma Shri for his contributions to literature and education. A passionate historian and mathematician, Gupta's work has significantly advanced the understanding of India's rich mathematical heritage. His dedication to history and mathematics inspires scholars and students alike. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Chapter 64

The Lesage Ancestry line

64.1 Introduction

This ancestry line concerns our ancestors in the region Ypres-Roeselare with the de Patin link. An ancestral overview is given in Figure 64.1.

64.2 Joannes Lesage (LS02) & Petronella Magerman

64.2.1 Joannes Lesage (LS02)

He died in Westrozebeke in 1746, in Figure 64.2.

64.2.2 Petronella Magerman

She was born in Moorslede in 1705, with baptism in Figure 64.3, and she died in Westrozebeke in 1746, in Figure 64.4.

64.2.3 Their Marriage

They married at Moorslede on April 17, 1725, in Figure 64.5.

64.2.4 Their Children

We found a document (akte nr. 3741 72v, December 3, 1762) at Roosebeke (Westrozebeke), called 'Renseing bij forme van Rekenijnghe der goederen toecomende aan de kinderen,' on December 3, 1762, Staten van Goed van het Graefschap Carnin en Staden, in which he is mentioned as Joannes Lesage, testator, deceased husband of Pieternelle Magherman, and having the following children: Joannes Baptiste Lesage (adult), Pieter Jacobus Lesage (adult), Josephus Florentinus Lesage (age 18), Anne Catherine Lesage (married to Pieter Anthone Maes), Marie Victoire Lesage (married to Pieter Van Mechelen) and Jacoba Lesage (married to Joseph Braem). The paternal guardian was Joseph Braem.
We also found the following daughters: Thérèse Lesage, born at Moorslede on September 3, 1731, who married Hendrik Maes, and who died in 1755 at Beveren[1]; Maria Agnes Lesage, born at Moorslede on February 15, 1730; Maria Rosa Lesage, born at Moorslede on May 13, 1728. Thérèse Lesage died in 1755 at Beveren as can be found in 'akte 1497 - Staten van goed, Kasselrij Ieper.'
Our ancestor, Jean Baptiste Joseph Lesage, is described in Chapter 64.3, while some of his siblings can be found in Figure 64.6.

64.3 Jean Baptiste Joseph Lesage (LS03) & Jeanne Claire Van Oost

64.3.1 Jean Lesage

He was born in Moorslede on July 20, 1734, in Figure 64.7, as the son of Jean-Baptiste Lesage ('Lesaege') and Petronella Magerman. He died at Staden on 5 Pluviose An VII, January 24, 1799, in Figure 64.8. This can be found in his son's wedding certificate.
In the tables with births, at Staden, he appears in the list of 1798 without month or day because An VII began on September 22, 1798. Therefore, this is merely a date conversion problem.
At the same time, the available civil and administrative records for Staden of that year began late in 1798. We assume, therefore, that he died in the Spring of 1798.
From his son's wedding certificate at Staden in 1807, we can infer that he passed away on January 24, 1798.

64.3.2 Jeanne Claire Van Oost

She was from Staden, where she was born in February 1740 in Figure 64.9.
She died in Staden on October 16, 1792, in Figure 64.10.

They married in Staden on October 28, 1765, in Figure 64.11.

64.4 Jean Lesage (LS04) & Barbe Thérèse Reynaert

Figure 64.18: Passchendaele, September 10, 1807, the marriage of Barbara Thérèse Reynaert and Jean Lesage (LS04). The bride was born in Passchendaele on December 13, 1781, and resided in Passchendaele. Her parents were Pierre Jean Reynaert (dead at Passchendaele on May 26, 1806) and Marie Jeanne Deman (alive and present). The groom was born in Staden on April 16, 1780, and resided in Langemark. His parents were Jean Baptiste Lesage[a] (dead at Staden on January 24, 1798) and Jeanne Claire Van Oost (dead at Staden on October 16, 1792). The witnesses were 32-year-old Pierre Lamaire, farmer at Staden and brother-in-law of the groom; 23-year-old Louis Reynaert, farmer, brother of the bride and residing in Passchendaele; 29-year-old Joseph Reynaert, the bride's brother who lived in Passchendaele; and 27-year-old David Reynaert, the brother of the bride, a farmer who lived in Passchendaele. (sheet 1)

[a] Ther record states that Jean Baptiste Lesage died in Staden on 5 Pluviose an VII, corresponding to January 24, 1799. This is a mistake as we found that it should have been 1798; therefore, it was probably 5 Pluviose an VI, corresponding to January 24, 1798.

64.4.1 Jean Lesage

Jean Lesage was born in Staden, in Figure 64.12, on April 16, 1780, and lived in Langemark. He had a sister, Helena Lesage, who died in Esen on December 7, 1840, at the age of 74, after whom, probably, Irma Helena Lesage, described in Chapter 45.2, was named.

The Godmother Marie Catherine Lamote and Joseph Florentin Lesage had a son, Pierre Lesage, who married Marie Thérèse Vermeulen in Staden on October 6, 1813. Marie Thérèse Vermeulen was the daughter of François Vermeulen and Marie Josephine Bardijn. The latter two married Maria Jacoba Bordin and Petrus Francis Vermeulen at Staden on July 5, 1785.

Petrus Francis Vermeulen was born in Staden in 1741.

He died in Staden, proven on the wedding certificate of his son, on October 2, 1843, and also in Figure 64.13. This family is related to Edward Vermeulen, described in Chapter 44.8.2 and Chapter 64.6.1.5.

64.4.2 Barbara Thérèse Reynaert

She was from Passchendaele, in Figures 64.14 and 64.15, and was born on December 13, 1781, in Figure 64.16.

Her father was Petrus Jean Reynaert, and her mother was Marie-Jeanne de Mare. Her godfather was Petrus Joannes De Poorter. Her godmother was Maria Anna Pype. She died in Staden in 1861, in Figure 64.17.

64.4.3 Their Marriage

They have married[2] at Passchendaele in 1807, in Figures 64.18 and 64.19. The witnesses were Pierre Lamaire, Louis Reynaert, Joseph Reynaert, and David Reynaert, all farmers.

64.5 Louis François Lesage (LS05) & Rosalie Dewanckele

64.5.1 Louis François Lesage

He was born in 1813 at Langemark, Belgium, in Figure 64.20, as the son of Jean Lesage and Barbe Thérèse Reynaert.

His military record is given in Figure 64.21.

He died in 1877, in Figure 64.22, at Westrozebeke, Belgium.

Louis François Lesage is primarily described in Chapter 65 as the husband of Rosalie Dewanckele.

He is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 66.2. as the great-great-grandson of Marie Jeanne Christine Benoit and Chapter 68, in the 't Kint ancestry line.

64.5.2 Rosalie Dewanckele

Her life events are shown in Chapter 65.18. She was a farmer born in 1816 in Hooglede, Belgium.

She was the wife of Louis François Lesage and died in 1872 at Westrozebeke, Belgium.

She is the mother of Emile Theophile Lesage. DNA evidence is given in Chapter 73.8 on page 1590.

Mevrouw Marie-Joseph Dewanckel

geboren te Langemark, de 23 juni 1909, en godvruchtig overleden te Moorslede de 27 mei 1963, gesterkt door de H.H. Sakramenten der zieken en de pauselijke zegen.
Hij was lid van alle godvruchtige genootschappen der parochie.

O God wij smeken U met aandrang voor de ziel van uw dienaar Antoine, die Gij heden tot U geroepen hebt ; laat haar door de heilige engelen opgenomen worden, naar het paradijs geleid worden en er de eeuwige vreugde bezitten.

We betreuren vandaag het afsterven van een trouw echtgenoot, een goede vader en grootvader, een stipt en werkzame burgemeester, een eerlijke en oprechte vriend.

Zijn gezin, echtgenote, kinderen en kleinkinderen waren zijn hoogste trots, hij was liefst met hen samen, bekommerd om hun ontwikkeling, hun groei, hun welstand ; de vlugge speelsheid van zijn kleinkinderen was hem een ware vreugde.

Zijn gemeenteschool was voor hem een grote kommer : verzorgde lokalen, een kristelijke opvoeding en een degelijk onderwijs was zijn vurigste wens.

Zijn gemeente betreurt het verlies van een groot burgemeester : in die zeer korte jaren van zijn ambt heeft hij bewezen waar talent te bezitten. Soms was hij wel wat kort maar toch altijd eerlijk en oprecht. Zijn woord was een mannenwoord.

Dierbare echtgenote, we hadden nog lang kunnen samenzijn, Vader heeft het anders gewild. Ik dank U om uw trouwe echtelijke liefde, ik dank U om uw fijnvoelende en geduldige zorgen, dag en nacht waart ge in die lange maanden van mijn ziekte de troostende engel. Laten we in de Heer voor eeuwig samenblijven.

Dierbare kinderen en kleinkinderen, wees altijd eerlijk en oprecht, blijf moeders sterke steun, blijf door een sterke familieband van mekaar houden en laten we veel voor mekaar bidden.

Dierbare medeburgers en vrienden, ook aan U heb ik veel te danken, veel schone dagen, veel vriendschap, deze zal niet uitsterven maar is voor deze jaren op de wereld nog enkel uit te leven in een vurig gebed.

Vijf Onze Vaders en vijf Weesgegroeten.... Heer geef zijn ziel de eeuwige rust.

EMILIE DURNEZ
WEDUWE VAN
HENRI LESAGE
geboren te Passchendaele den 23 Maart 1863 en godvruchtig overleden te St Jan (Hooge Zieken) den 26 April 1927, versterkt door de Heilige Sacramenten der Stervenden.

Zij was lid van het Broederschap van het H. Hert van Jesus en van de H. Barbara.

Omringd van hare kinderen en bloedverwanten, zag zij de dood met gerustheid naderen, met die bovennatuurlijke gerustheid en gelatenheid, die de kostbaarste genade is voor de stervende en de zoetste troost voor de overlevenden; met het kruisbeeld op de lippen ontsliep zij zachtjes in den Heer.

Voorbeeld der christene moeders, wandelde zij in al de geboden en voorschriften des Heeren. Door woord en daad sloeg zij een wakend oog over den omgang van haar huis, leerde hare kinderen van jongs af God vreezen en heeft ze tot een deugdzaam leven gevormd.

Lieve kinderen, het geheugen uwer moeder blijve immer in uw hert geprent! Onderhoudt wat gij van mij gezien en gehoord hebt en de God van Vrede zal u zegenen. Blijft mij gedachtig in uwe gebeden.

Zoet Hert van Jesus, ontferm u onzer. 100 d. afl.

Comme un autre Moïse, à qui il ressemblait par sa douceur, il était le guide fidèle de ceux qui lui avaient été confiés; — il en a instruit beaucoup dans la justice; — bon pasteur, il aimait ses brebis, et il était prêt à donner sa vie pour elles; — père des pauvres et consolateur des affligés, il aidait l'indigent qui lui demandait du secours et l'orphelin sans soutien, et il consolait le cœur de la veuve : car la compassion avait grandi avec lui dès son enfance; — personne ne parlait mal de lui. — Aussi Dieu sera sa récompense abondante, — il est digne de vivre dans le souvenir des gens de bien, — et sa mémoire sera en bénédiction.

Dès son enfance elle marchait dans les sentiers de la paix et de la justice. — Elle était simple et droite, craignant Dieu et inébranlable dans sa foi. — La force était son vêtement. — Elle tenait l'œil ouvert sur les sentiers de sa maison. Elle ouvrait sa main à l'indigent et tendait ses bras vers le pauvre et l'infirme. — Epuisée de forces elle rendit doucement son âme à son Créateur, parvenue à une heureuse vieillesse, vraie Couronne d'honneur, quand on a suivi les voies de la justice.

Nous avons aimé notre mère, et sa mort nous prive de la plus douce consolation ...... Elle nous avait élevés dans la Crainte du Seigneur ...... Mille actions de grâces, ô mon Dieu! mille actions de grâces vous soient rendues de nous avoir conservé si longtemps une mère si tendre et si digne de notre affection..... Vous nous l'aviez accordée pour notre bonheur...... Vous nous l'avez redemandée: nous vous en fesons la sacrifice sans murmure; mais le cœur navré de douleur....... Que votre sainte volonté soit faite, et que son âme repose en paix.

64.6 Emile Theophile Lesage & Eudoxie Romanie Lammens

64.6.1 Emile Theophile Lesage

64.6.1.1 Introduction

Emile Lesage, shown in Figure 64.29, was born on June 29, 1857, in Westrozebeke, Belgium, as the son of Louis François Lesage and Rosalie Dewanckele.
He died in 1938 in Beselare, Belgium.
Emile Theophile Lesage is primarily described as the author's great-grandfather in Chapter 64.
He is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 65, as great-great-great-great-grandson of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); and also in Chapter 66.2, as the great-great-great-grandson of Marie Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 68, in the 't Kint ancestry line; and Chapter 71, as the son-in-law of Clemens Lammens and Natalia Juliana Decaestecker.
Emile Lesage, a distinguished member of the landed gentry, was widely respected in his community. He married later in life, likely prioritizing economic stability before starting a family. Despite having numerous children, he ensured each one received financial support to establish their careers and secure viable marriages. Although much of his story has been lost to time, several notable anecdotes remain.
One such tale involves the annual gift of a salted and dried ham to the postman every New Year, a gesture eagerly anticipated by the recipient. Another story from Emile's youth recounts a transaction in which he sold a horse for significant cash. Suspecting the buyer might rob him, Emile discreetly left the inn and ran home to safeguard his earnings, an episode preserved in family lore.
Between 1910 and 1912, Emile planned to invest in the United States, intending to purchase land, likely for his eldest son, Cyrille Lesage. However, he postponed the trip for unknown reasons. When the Titanic tragically sank in April 1912, a legend emerged that Emile had narrowly missed being a passenger, potentially saving his life—a story that endures to this day.
Before he died in 1938, Emile expressed concerns to his son-in-law, Michel Declercq, about the size of his family. Emile suggested that Michel buy a farm in Cordes (Frasnes-les-Avaing) and cease expanding his family. Michel, citing his Christian duty, insisted on having more children, while his wife Irma refused to move, disliking the isolation of Cordes.
Emile maintained a close friendship with the Declercqs of Wielsbeke and was determined to support his youngest children in marrying into this esteemed family. To this end, he provided substantial financial assistance.
His youngest daughter, Irma Lesage, married Michel Declercq in 1932, and his son Daniel was engaged to Valentine Declercq, considered the most attractive of the Declercq daughters. However, plans changed when Gerard Lesage, another of Emile's sons, died. Daniel was compelled to break off his engagement and marry Gerard's widow, Magdalena Meersseman, to ensure the continuation of Gerard's farm.
This decision had significant repercussions. Valentine Declercq was deeply affected, as detailed in Chapters 64.7.12 and 44.5.5.
Emile and Daniel's actions, while pragmatic, may seem unsympathetic.
Alternatively, their sense of duty to Magdalena Meersseman may have left them no choice. This incident likely profoundly impacted Irma Lesage, potentially making her vulnerable to manipulation within the Declercq household, although there is no evidence to suggest this occurred.

64.6.1.2 Birth and childhood

His birth, in Figure 64.31, was on June 29, 1857, in Westrozebeke, seen in Figure 64.30.

64.6.1.3 His Military Service

He did his military service in 1877, as seen from his record in Figure 64.32. This was also the year when Graham Bell first presented the telephone to the public, Queen Victoria became Empress of India, and the Wimbledon tennis tournament was first held.

64.6.1.4 Whereabouts in Peace and War

Emile Lesage lived in Westrozebeke, shown in Figures 64.33 and 64.30, where he would continue to live with Eudoxie until 1896-1897. Eudoxie Lammens was born in Zonnebeke but lived in Passchendaele when they married in 1888.
While they lived in Westrozebeke, they had the following children: Cyrille (1890), Alida (1892), Maria (1893) and Amandine (1895). They lost Alida one month after her birth.
The family moved to Moorslede before 1898, where Gerard (1898), Hector (1898), Maria (1900), Paul (1902), Godelieve (1903), Irma (1905), Oscar (1906) and Daniel (1911) would be born. At Moorslede, shown in Figure 64.34, they lived near the train station in Statiestraat 518.
In July of 1912, the family moved to Ledegem, in Figure 64.35, to a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. Everything went well until WWI started in the summer of 1914. As described in Chapter 64.6.1.5, during WWI, Emile Lesage stayed with his son Paul Lesage at the farm in Ledegem. At the same time, Eudoxie moved with the other children to Oudezeele in France. Meanwhile, Cyrille Lesage was a soldier, and later, two other sons, Gerard and Hector, were also recruited while in France.
After the war, the entire region was devastated and required reconstruction, as seen in Figures 64.37 and 64.38. Moving back right away was impossible.
The census of Beselare of 1920-1930 shows, for Keiberg - Spilstraat 12, the following inhabitants: Lesage Emile (arrived from Ledegem on September 30, 1921), Martha, Amanda, Gerard, Marie, Paulus, Godelieva, Helena; and Lammens Eudoxie (arrived from Ledegem on September 30, 1921). Note that 'Helena' was actually 'Irma Helena,' i.e., the author's grandmother.
The census of Beselare of 1930-1940 shows, for Keiberg - Spilstraat 12, the following inhabitants: Lesage Emile (arrived from Ledegem on September 30, 1921), Godelieva, Irma, Oscar, Daniel, Maria (2x), Andreas; and Soenen Anna.
Based on the fact that Daniel Lesage never mentioned 'Ledegem' in the 1980s, while he often talked about Beitem, we must assume that the Lesage family was more closely connected to Beitem, in Figure 64.36 than Ledegem. Beitem is not a village but is a parish distributed over three villages, including Moorslede and Ledegem.
It's likely that, despite the location of their farm on the ground of Ledegem, their social life was in Beitem. After the war, Daniel and Oscar Lesage went to school in Beitem. They possibly resided with Gerard Lesage or one of the parents in Ledegem after the war while a new farm was under construction in Beselare.
On September 30, 1921, the family changed its official address from Ledegem to Beselare, Spilstraat 12 on 'Keiberg,' at the junction with Slangemeersstraat. However, Paul Lesage stayed at Ledegem and became a harness manufacturer because he had an arm injury due to a bombardment on August 4, 1916.

Figure 64.29: Emile Theophile Lesage was a wealthy, wise man, ten years older than his wife, Eudoxie Romanie Lammens, and highly praised in his village. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

64.6.1.5 The WWI experience

64.6.1.5.1 Ledegem During World War I, Eudoxie resided with her children in Oudezeele, France, staying with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77. This address, positioned near the village center and the Café des Trois Rois, was listed as number 49 among the homes housing refugees in Oudezeele. The household comprised two adults and several children, with Eudoxie registered as Mme Eudoxie Lesage. The two adults were Eudoxie and her eldest daughter, Martha.

The terror of World War I reached Ledegem on October 19, 1914, a day infamously known as Schuwe Maandag or 'Terrifying Monday'[4]. Due to insufficient records, it is unclear where every family member was on that specific date. It is possible that some had already fled, or they were still in Ledegem, soon to escape the impending violence. Emile Lesage remained on the family farm with his son Paul, while Eudoxie and most of her children moved to Oudezeele in northern France.

On Terrifying Monday, British forces liberated parts of West and South Ledegem. However, the Germans managed to reclaim these areas after a day of intense fighting. The unexpected resistance from the British led the Germans to believe that the civilian population had supported the enemy, prompting a brutal retaliation. Many civilians were killed or wounded, and numerous farms and homes were set ablaze. The atrocities were so extreme that subsequent German arrivals documented their disgust in their diaries. Frans Huyghe and Filip Jacques[5] cite Max Hoelz and Heinrich Wandt, noting that the German soldiers responsible were drunk and wrongly believed a young girl had shot a soldier. Later investigations revealed this was impossible, as the girl was not present at the massacre site, and the local populace had surrendered their weapons well before the event.

Under German occupation, Belgium saw its administrative structures supplanted by German authorities, although local village governance remained intact. In areas far from the front lines, a semblance of normalcy persisted with some freedoms allowed to the population. However, in frontline villages like Ledegem, military rule was strict. Residents were confined to their towns, and heavy taxation was imposed on goods. Farmers, including Emile and Paul Lesage, were compelled to relinquish a substantial portion of their produce to the German army. Post-1914, the threat of death also came from British forces positioned across the frontline.

In early August 1916, Ledegem suffered bombings, particularly near the train station and Pionierpark on the village's north side. These attacks resulted in the deaths of a dozen civilians. Sources conflict with the exact dates, citing either August 1 or 4, suggesting possible bombardments on both days. During one such attack, Paul Lesage was severely injured while peeling potatoes on the farm; he either lost or was disabled in his left arm due to the bombing. The impact of World War I on Ledegem and Beitem is graphically depicted in Figures 64.39 and 64.40.

[4] Schuwe maandag appears in Chapter 48.9.5.4.5, Chapter 64.6.1.5.1, Chapter 64.7.1.6.7, and Chapter 65.

64.6.1.5.2 Wielsbeke As previously noted, Paul Lesage's left arm was severely injured in early August 1916. The following summer, Paul and his father, Emile Lesage, were compelled to leave Ledegem. On July 23, 1917, they were expelled from their village and relocated to Wielsbeke. They likely stayed for several months at the farm of the Declercq family, where Paul Lesage, who was the same age as the eldest Declercq son, could find companionship. Despite their relocation, the official Belgian address of the entire Lesage-Lammens family remained in Ledegem, even though, from July 1917 onwards, no family members resided there.
Ledegem had remained relatively tranquil during the early years of World War I. However, the situation changed dramatically in the summer of 1917 due to significant developments on the Western Front, particularly with British forces breaching German defense lines in the Ypres salient. The Battle of Passchendaele, also known as the Third Battle of Ypres, raged from July 31 to November 10, 1917.
The information provided here is based on private communication between the author and Frans Huyge, the co-author of 'Ledeghem in den Grooten Oorlog, as well as personal interactions between the author and his granduncle, Daniel Lesage, in the 1980s. Additional details can be found in the book above. On August 1, 1916, a bomb struck the Lesage farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. Paul Lesage, who was peeling potatoes at the time, suffered severe injuries to his left arm, resulting in its loss or permanent disability. The Lesage farm was not the sole property affected by the conflict.
In 1917, the German forces decided to evacuate most of Ledegem's population, approximately 130 families, as the area had become a critical transfer hub for goods, mainly bricks, iron, and cement, making it a target for British attacks. The German authorities forced the local residents to relocate to various villages, although the specific destinations for each family were only sometimes documented. Some recorded destinations included Moorsele, Gullegem, Lendelede, Kortrijk, Harelbeke, Bavikhove, Beveren-Leie, Desselgem, Deerlijk, Dentergem, Wakken, Machelen, Meulebeke, Wielsbeke, Zwevezele, Kruishoutem, Wannegem-Lede, Zwevegem, Heestert, Avelgem, Ruien, Ronse, Eine, Oudenaarde, Schoonaarde, Orroir, Deinze, Huyse, Wiese, Denderbelle, Londerzeel, Wolvertem, Sint-Amand-Puurs, Balen, Ukkel, and Brussels.
Only a few farmers returned to Ledegem to tend their land in the spring and summer of 1918. Wielsbeke became the refuge for Emile and Paul Lesage, where they stayed with the family of Ernest Constant Declercq. It is possible that the Lesage and Declercq families were acquainted before the war, given that later, two children from each family became engaged, with one couple eventually marrying—these being the author's grandparents. When Emile Lesage was ordered to leave Ledegem in 1917, he quickly took a figurine of Mary with him, which he kept throughout his displacement; this figurine still exists today, as shown in Figure 64.45.

In particular, we see the results of the August 4, 1916 assault on the village, such as a destroyed farm and Germans showing the destruction caused by shells. During this tumultuous period, Emile and Paul likely had little information about the whereabouts or well-being of Eudoxie and the other children, who were located in Oudezeele. Communication across the frontline was severely restricted, with occasional messages smuggled through Great Britain and the Netherlands, though it is uncertain if any such news reached the Lesages. One son, Cyrille, had already died, another son, Gerard, was fighting at the front, and the youngest son, Hector, would soon join the army and be killed before the war's end.

Huyge-Jacques said only men between 14-18 and 65-70 were permitted to stay in Ledegem after September 1917. By November of that year, nearly the entire population had left. Emile, at 60 years old, and Paul, 15 and handicapped, likely did not return to Ledegem until after the war concluded. They probably remained with the Declercqs in Wielsbeke at Hof van Brussel[6] until the war's end.

The remaining residents of Ledegem faced harsh conditions in 1918, as the frustrated and poorly provisioned German soldiers often mistreated the locals, including severe beatings for those attempting to protect their crops.

64.6.1.5.3 Meanwhile in Emile Lesage's Birthplace Illustrations of the impact of WWI on Westrozebeke, where Emile Lesage was born, are shown in Figure 64.41.

64.6.1.6 His Wife's Death and His Role as a Widower

Emile Lesage spent his final years devotedly supporting his children, drawing upon his vast wisdom and rich life experiences. He lived with his son Oscar and his family, imparting his knowledge until his passing.

In Beselare, Oscar proudly carried on the family farm, honoring his father's legacy. Some impressions are shown in Figures 64.42 and 64.43.

The farm still exists, although it has been modernized by Oscar and later by subsequent owners. The reader can enjoy it in Figure 64.44.

64.6.1.7 His Death

When Emile Lesage died, in Figure 64.46, he was buried with his wife at Beselare.

Some of Emile Lesage's memorabilia can be seen in Figures 64.47, 64.45 and 64.48.

64.6.2 Eudoxie Romanie Lammens

64.6.2.1 Introduction

She was a lady with military blood, born in 1868 in Zonnebeke, Belgium.

She resided in Passchendaele, Belgium, where she married Emile Lesage in 1888.

She died in 1931 in Beselare.

Eudoxie Romanie Lammens is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 65, as great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.2, as great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Marie Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 68, in the 't Kint ancestry line; and Chapter 71, as the daughter of Clemens Lammens and Natalia Juliana Decaestecker.

Early in her marriage, she lived at Westrozebeke, where her husband, Emile Theophile Lesage, had been born.

Consequently, she moved to Moorslede, then to Ledegem, from there to Oudezeele, and from Oudezele to Beselare.

Her parents were Clement Lammens and Nathalie Julie Decasestecker, both farmers. Nathalie Julie Decaestecker was from a family of farmers at Passchendaele. Clement Lammens is the son of Joseph Leopold Lammens (Vladslo 1790-1847), married Anne Thérèse Pareyn, and both were farmers.

Both their parents were from Vladslo and were also farmers.

Different genealogists trace Nathalie Julie Decaestecker's ancestors to Vincent van Qoilge, born in 1390 and died in 1420, and Bardeyn le Cluyse, born in 1547. Joseph Leopold Lammens was the grandson of Jean Norbert Lammens and Anne Marie Winne, who married in Vladslo in 1714.

The Lammens family can be traced back to the area of Veurne where, for instance, Jacques Lammens, the Lord of Brouckerkhove, was first a captain in the army at Nieuwpoort and was later mayor of Veurne in the early 17th century.

(Declercq de Silva Archive)*

Ann Thérèse Pareyn, the grandmother of Eudoxie, was the great-great-granddaughter of Jean François Ardan and Marie Josephe Rouye, who married at Damme in 1698. Jean François Ardan was a military stationed at Damme in the garrison of de Rysbourgh and later de Morel; his granddaughter was Anne Marie Francoise Caestecker, Anne Thérèse's grandmother.
Interestingly, in the 17th century, the Declergues also appeared in Damme about the military. So, these two bloodlines may have encountered each other already at that time.

64.6.2.2 Military Blood

Eudoxie Lammens descends from ancestry lines that were closely involved in warfare. Also, her sons paid their dues during WWI and WWII. As mentioned in the previous section, for instance, the bloodline of Lammens stems from Jacques Lammens, the Lord of Brouckerkhove, who was first a captain in the army at Nieuwpoort and was later mayor of Veurne in the early 17th century. In this book, there are several chapters on blood relatives of Eudoxie Romanie Lammens, who served the military, such as:
Jean François Ardan (17th century), Burgundian Regiment of the Spanish Army in Belgium;
Pierre Joseph Decaestecker (1785 - 1868), Army of Napoleon;
Charles Lammens (1814 - 1881), Belgian Army with Henri Conscience;
Cyrille Camille Lesage (1890 - 1916), Belgian Army, WWI;
Hector Alidor Lesage (1898 - 1918), Belgian Army, WWI; Gerard Medard Lesage (1887 - 1933), Belgian Army, WWI; and Oscar Lesage (1906 - 1990), Belgian Army, WWII.
The author's father, the grandson of Eudoxie, was equally a trained military engineer. Before he became an American employee, the author was once supported by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) for scientific collaboration with the Americans and the Russians.

64.6.2.3 Birth and Childhood

Eudoxie was born in Figure 64.49 and raised in Zonnebeke in Figure 64.50. She probably said 'Zinnebeke' as the village is locally called. Indeed, the earliest records dating back 1000 years indicate that the original name of this village was 'Sinnebeke.'
Zonnebeke, a picturesque village during Eudoxie's time, faced devastation in World War I. Below are images from circa 1900, capturing the serene beauty she experienced before relocating to Passchendaele and marrying Emile Lesage.

64.6.2.4 Whereabouts in Peacetime

As mentioned, Eudoxie Lammens was born in Zonnebeke but lived in Passchendaele at her wedding in 1888. Emile Lesage lived in Westrozebeke, where he would continue to live with Eudoxie until 1896-1897. While they lived in Westrozebeke, they had the following children: Cyrille (1890), Alida (1892), Maria (1893) and Amandine (1895). They lost Alida one month after her birth.
The family moved to Moorslede before 1898, where Gerard (1898), Hector (1898), Maria (1900), Paul (1902), Godelieve (1903), Irma (1905), Oscar (1906) and Daniel (1911) would be born. At Moorslede, they lived very near to the train station in Statiestraat 518.
In July of 1912, the family moved to Ledegem to a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. Everything went well until WWI raged in the summer of 1914.
During the German invasion of Belgium, Eudoxie fled to Oudezeele in the North of France, close to the Belgian border. Emile Lesage stayed at the farm in Ledegem with Paul while Cyrille was in the military. Later, the other sons, Gerard and Hector, would also join the military after moving with their mother to Oudezeele.
On July 23, 1917, Emile Lesage and Paul were expelled from their village of Ledegem and went to Wielsbeke. They stayed several months at the farm of the Declercq family. Paul Lesage was the same age as the eldest son of the Declercq family. The whole time, the official Belgian address of the entire Lesage-Lammens family remained at Ledegem, although from July 1917 onwards, nobody lived there anymore.
On September 30, 1921, the family changed its official address from Ledegem to Beselare, Spilstraat 12 on 'Keiberg,' at the junction with Slangemeersstraat. Paul Lesage, however, stayed at Ledegem and would, given that his left arm had been injured on August

On July 23, 1917, a shell hit the Lesage farm (Kortwagenstraat 33, Ledegem), and the figurine survived. When Emile had to leave the farm with Paul the following year, they quickly took some things, including this statue. Afterward, Emile could laugh about it. It may have reminded him of his wife and family. Later, the figure moved with his favorite daughter, Irma Lesage, to Deerlijk. Maria Declercq, the author's auntie, is now taking care of it. EMIEL-CORNELIUS LESAGE

WEDUWNAAR VAN VROUW

Eudoxie-Romanie LAMMENS

geboren te West-Roozebeke den 29 Juni 1857, en godvruchtig in den Heer ontslapen te Beselare den 4 Oktober 1938, voorzien met de H.H. Gerechten.

Godvruchtig en voorzichtig leidde hij een matig en onberispelijk leven. Bemind van God en de menschen blijft zijne gedachtenis in zegening.

Ik heb U het goed voorbeeld gegeven, opdat gij doen zoudt zooals ik gedaan heb. (Joan. XIII)

Al zijn behagen vond hij in de werken van den akker door God geschapen. (Eccl. VII)

De wegen van zijn huis sloeg hij gade; zijne kinderen leerde hij van jongs af God vreezen en alle kwaad schuwen en zijn mond sprak woorden van wijsheid en goedheid. (Spr.)

Lieve Kinderen en Kleinkinderen, mijne kroon en mijn troost in mijnen ouden dag, blijft voort doen hetgene gij van mij geleerd, gehoord en gezien hebt en de God van vrede zal met U zijn. Blijft mij indachtig in uwe gebeden. Tot een blij wederziens hierboven.

1, 1916, due to a bombardment, become a harness manufacturer.
The census of Beselare of 1920-1930 shows, for Keiberg - Spilstraat 12, the following inhabitants: Lesage Emile and Eudoxie Lammens, who arrived (officially) from Ledegem on September 30, 1921; and also Martha, Amanda, Gerard, Marie, Paulus, Godelieve, (Irma) Helena. The census of Beselare of 1930-1940 did no longer count Eudoxie, but showed, for Keiberg - Spilstraat 12, the following inhabitants: Lesage Emile, Godelieve, Irma, Oscar, Daniel, Maria, Maria (daughter of Oscar), Andrea (daughter of Oscar), and Soenen Anna (wife of Oscar).

64.6.2.5 Residence at Oudezeele During WWI

We refer to Figures 64.51 and 64.52. Eudoxie lived with her children in Oudezeele in France during WWI with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, the road from the village center to Café des Trois Rois, the house near the village center. The home was designated number 49 on the list of homes of refugees at Oudezeele during WWI. The family consisted of 2 adults (+ children), and Eudoxie was registered as Mme Eudoxie Lesage. The two adults were Eudoxie and her eldest daughter Martha. After the war, the area where she had lived before was devastated. Therefore, Eudoxie stayed with some of the children in Oudezeele. As far as possible, they would return first to Ledegem and then move on September 30, 1921, from Ledegem to Spilstraat 12 on 'Keiberg' in Beselare[7]. While Eudoxie was still a resident of Oudezeele, some children resided already at Ledegem and were with their families in Moorslede-Zonnebeke. Oscar Lesage and Daniel Lesage remained in Ledegem, probably in Beitem, with their brother Gerard Lesage and would move to Beselare to the parents' address in the 1930s. When Eudoxie officially moved from Ledegem to Beselare on September 30, 1921, she moved from Oudezeele, where she also gave up her residence. So, her address in France was a whereabout address, while officially in Belgium, she had still been registered in Ledegem.

The author received this friendly message[8] from Mr and Mrs Regine et Regis Beaucamp in Oudezele:

Bonjour M Declercq,
Nous avons bien reçu votre courrier dont nous vous remercions.
Voici en retour, les premières réponses à votre question:
la maison existe toujours, la famille Secq a construit une nouvelle habitation devant l' ancienne 77 route des Trois Rois.
Les familles n' oublient pas ce qu' elles ont vécu pendant ces guerres.
Vos documents seront classés dans l' album des anciens combatants.
Avec nos remerciement et nos sentiments les meilleurs

64.6.2.6 Devastation During WWI and Rehabilitation of the Area Where Eudoxie was Rooted

The cataclysm of World War I profoundly scarred Eudoxie and Emile. Not only did they endure the unbearable loss of their children, but they also witnessed their homeland reduced to ruins. The war's relentless devastation transformed their once-vibrant

Figure 64.48: Several expired shares are visible. The one of 1900 shows that, before WWI, investments in agriculture must have been popular with farmers in West Flanders. Others are also shown, such as 1919-1921-1922 shares purchased after WWI to reconstruct the country. Our archive has a dozen more of them. 1923-1925-1927, shares were purchased after WWI to rebuild the country. A share of 1927 shows that investing in the Belgian Congo in the 1920s must have been a quest for security after the WWI experience of destruction. We know that Emile Lesage cherished the United States of America and that, just before WWI, he even had plans to visit the country to purchase land for one of his children. His attitude remained unchanged after the war, as seen in the 1929 share. 1930-1938 shares were purchased in the interbellum and had a common purpose similar to the pre-WWI period. (Declercq de Silva Archive) region into a desolate lunar landscape, demanding a monumental effort to rebuild and restore what had been lost.

64.6.2.6.1 Devastations During WWI Images tell more than text. The gradual devastations of Zonnebeke, where Eudoxie was born and raised, can be observed in Figure 64.59.

64.6.2.6.2 Rehabilitation of the Area After WWI Just after WWI, many inhabitants decided never to return to the area. The ones who did return shared the area with Chinese workers who cleaned up the region. Imagine all the barbwire, shell remains, trenches, dirt, bunkers, holes, and ditches everywhere, while every tree was gone and every home and church destroyed. Inhabitants stayed in nearby undestroyed villages with family or sheltered in barracks.

64.6.2.7 Human Loss During WWI

Below, we refer to 5 casualties. There could be more, however.

64.6.2.7.1 Cyrille Camille Lesage Cyrille Camille Lesage (1890 - 1916) died in Paris, where he was buried at Père Lachaise. He is extensively described in Chapter 64.7.1.

64.6.2.7.2 Hector Alidor Lesage Hector Alidor Lesage (1898 - 1918) died during the final assault in 1918. He is thoroughly reported in Chapter 64.7.6.

64.6.2.7.3 Paul Lesage Paul Lesage (1902 - 1976) injured or lost his arm in August 1916. More information is presented in Chapter 64.7.8.

64.6.2.7.4 Gerard Lesage Gerard Medard Lesage (1887 - 1933). His lungs, scarred by a gas assault, bore silent witness to the ravages of war, and it was pneumonia that ultimately claimed his life, slipping him away in the winter of 1933 or 1934.
The reader will find more about him in Chapter 64.7.5.

64.6.2.7.5 Maurice Cyrille Willaert Maurice Cyrille Willaert played a significant role in the occupation of the Rhineland in Germany from 1919 to 1923. This occupation, conducted in collaboration with French and British forces, aimed to ensure that Germany would not invade its neighbors again following the devastating consequences of World War I. The military presence was critical to the post-war efforts to maintain peace and stability in Europe. Maurice Cyrille Willaert's involvement in this occupation suggests that he joined the military shortly after World War I. His participation in such a significant historical event reflects his active engagement in the efforts to secure and rebuild Europe after the war. To understand Maurice Willaert's family background, we include his obituary card in Figure 64.61. The card highlights the prevalence of specific names within Eudoxie's family, such as Romanie and Cyrille, underscoring the continuity of family traditions and naming practices. Maurice Willaert was born in Keiem in 1902 to Charles Willaert and Romanie Lammens. His life was tragically short, as he passed away in 1925. His mother, Romanie Lammens, was born in Vladslo on May 4, 1870, to farmers Robert Lammens and Amelie Mergaert. Robert and Amelie were married in Vladslo on May 3, 1866. Robert Lammens, born on February 26, 1832, was the son of Joseph Leopold Lammens and Anne Thérèse Parein. Thus, Maurice Willaert's great-grandfather, Joseph Leopold Lammens, was also the grandfather of Eudoxie Lammens, as described in Chapter 71.6. This genealogical context provides a comprehensive view of Maurice Cyrille Willaert's familial connections,

64.6.2.8 The Death of Eudoxie Lammens

Eudoxie succumbed to edema, likely resulting from congestive heart failure, mirroring the fate of her son Daniel, who died from the same condition in 1988. The family vividly recalls the excruciating final weeks of her life. As her condition deteriorated, a doctor resorted to using a trocar to alleviate the swelling in her legs, a desperate measure reflecting the severity of her suffering.

An oil lamp, casting a somber glow, sat on her night table—a silent witness to her agony. Despite the apparent gravity of her condition, her physician inexplicably chose not to hospitalize her, a decision that has haunted her family. In her final days, Eudoxie clung to her faith, praying to 'The Holy Heart' in an emotional plea for relief that never came.

The oil lamp from her bedside remains, a poignant relic displayed in Figure 64.62. Figures 64.63 and 64.62 capture the heartbreaking images taken during her last days—an attempt to preserve her memory while she was still alive. Her obituary card, shown in Figure 64.63, and her tomb in Figure 64.62, stand as solemn testaments to her life and suffering.

Tragically, only two photographs of Eudoxie exist, both taken when she was gravely ill and on the brink of death. These images were meant to serve as a memento, a final glimpse of a life overshadowed by relentless pain.

64.6.3 The Marriage of Emile Theophile Lesage and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens

Their wedding, in Figure 64.65, was in 1888 at Passchendaele, in Figure 64.64, on September 28, 1888, three months after the death of Charles Philippe J. M. J. de Patin of Langemack, shown in Chapter 70.10.

In het midden mijner dagen ga ik naar de poorten des grafs. Ik zocht naar het overige mijner dagen... De draad mijns levens is afgesneden,.. Ik hoopte tot den morgenstond toe,.. maar Gij, o Heer hebt mijne ziel gered opdat zij niet zou vergaan... Nu zullen wij u loven al de dagen van ons leven. Isaïas 38.

Iedereen getuigt van hem dat hij een ware christen was, die, door den geest des geloofs in al zijne werken bezield, vuriglijk God en zijne H. Kerk beminde, die door zijne werkzaamheid en kinderlijke gehoorzaamheid zijne ouders gelukkig maakte die door zijne minzaamheid en vriendelijke betrekkingen de achting en genegenheid won van allen die hem kenden, nalatende eenen naam zonder vlek, een voorbeeld van vroom geloof en christene deugd.

Heer, Gij hadt ons dien braven zoon geschonken, wij danken U ervoor. Gij ontneemt hem ons. Het herte vol droefheid maar ook vol gelatenheid, geven wij hem U terug: Uw Wil geschiede op de aarde als in den Hemel.

Dierbare Ouders en Broeders, mijn afscheid dompelt u in weedom en verdriet. Ik beminde u zoo zeer; ik werkte neerstiglijk voor u, maar in den Hemel zal ik u voort beminnen en voor u ten beste spreken bij God, den Heer. Gij, toont mij voort uwe liefde met wel voor mij te bidden.

Figure 64.65: Passchendaele, September 28, 1888. This is the wedding of Emile Theophile Lesage, a farmer from Westrozebeke, born at Westrozebeke on June 29, 1857, with Eudoxia Romania Lammens, a farmer from Passchendaele, born at Zonnebeke on May 16, 1868. The witnesses were Louis Lesage, Rosalie Dewanckele, Clement Lammens and Juliana Decasestecker.

64.6.4 Acquaintances of Emile Theophile Lesage and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens

64.6.4.1 Acquaintance Edward Vermeulen

The Vermeulen family was related to the Lesages, as found in the earliest records shown above of the Lesages. Edward Vermeulen, also known under the pseudonym 'Warden Oom,' (Beselare 1861 – Hooglede 1934) was a writer. He was of the same generation as Emile Theophile Theophile Lesage (Westrozebeke 1857 – Beselare 1938), and they lived within walking distance from one another during their youth (from 1865 until 1888). They must have known each other personally, as they were related to the same primary school at Hooglede. When Emile Theophile Lesage moved to Beselare, he settled with his family at a new farm in 'Slangenmeersstraat' just after WWI, approximately 2 km from Edward Vermeulen's birthplace at Navingeer[9]. It is there that Emile's youngest daughter, Irma Helena Lesage, grandmother of N.F. Declercq got engaged with Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq when he visited Beselare for several reasons: to buy flax; to see the birthplace of Edward Vermeulen, well known to Michel because of his interest in Flemish literature; to visit the village of Beselare, well known for its inspirational and famous folk tales; and because Emile Lesage knew the Declercqs from the last year of WWI when he stayed at Wielsbeke after he had to leave Ledegem in 1917.

When Edward Vermeulen studied at Klein Seminarie of Roeselare (until 1877), one of his teachers was Flemish writer Hugo Verriest, who would later become a priest at Wakken (not far from where the Declercq and Demedts families lived) and who was born in Deerlijk and stemmed from the Verriest family of Sint Lodewijk Deerlijk, where Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq would later settle with his own family and where the author has grown up. Edward Vermeulen frequently wrote about the life of farmers, which must have appealed to Michel Declercq.

Note also that André Demedts, a good friend of Michel Declercq, was a fan of Edward Vermeulen. In 1937 for instance, he wrote a book about him.[10]

Edward Vermeulen was born Aloise Edouard Vermeulen on April 19, 1861, as the son of Auguste Vermeulen and Marie Thérèse Spruytte. It is not a coincidence that Michel Declercq named one of his sons after Vermeulen, Maurice Alois Declercq, the author's father.

Edwards's father was Augustus Vermeulen, born at Beselare on July 26, 1829, as the son of Petrus Josephus Vermeulen and Amelia Judith Drouillon. Ernest Constant Declercq named one of his daughters 'Judith.'

If the reader is further interested, Petrus Josephus Vermeulen was born at Beselare on December 24, 1764, was a farmer, and married Amelia Judith Drouillon at Beselare on October 4, 1817. Judith was born at Moorslede on April 13, 1789, and was a farmer too. Petrus Josephus was a son of Jean-Baptiste Vermeulen and Marie Jacoba Nuytten, while Judith was a daughter of Antonius Josephus Drouillon and Marie Joacoba Lehouck.

A transformative experience during World War I notably marked Edward Vermeulen's life. In the summer of 1917, while Vermeulen was residing in Hooglede, his village, akin to Ledegem, where Emile Lesage lived, faced evacuation.

Consequently, Vermeulen spent a period in and around Meulebeke before proceeding to Mol. The central square of Meulebeke is merely 8 kilometers from Ernest Constant's residence in Wielsbeke, and we know that Vermeulen visited Wielsbeke, despite its absence in his memoir[11]. It is plausible that his friend Emile Lesage seized the opportunity to invite him to Wielsbeke, where he was staying with the Declercq family. Additionally, Marie Elodie Devenyn had familial connections in Meulebeke through the Vereecke and De Bouvere families. Such encounters occurred, especially considering the passage of numerous Hooglede villagers through Meulebeke and Wielsbeke during that period. While Lesage resided in Ledegem, he was initially from Westrozebeke, adjacent to Hooglede and Staden; therefore, he knew the villagers who passed through Meulebeke and Wielsbeke.

After all, the fastest route from Hooglede to Mol is through Meulebeke, and from Meulebeke to Wielsbeke, where the road adjacent to the Leie River is taken toward Deinze and Ghent.[12]

Vermeulen's account of his 1917 experiences was published in 1934. Notably, he was welcomed in Meulebeke by the school principal, Van Hove. The Van Hove and De Bouvere families were interconnected through marriage in 1835, which further implies that the Lesage and Declercq families were involved in Vermeulen's residence in Meulebeke in 1917.

Geboren te Becelaere, den 19 April 1861, en godvruchtig overleden te Hooglede, den 6 Juli 1934, na de H. Gerechten ontvangen te hebben.

De duurbare overledene was lid van den H. Hartebond en al de Broederschappen der parochie, Oud-Prefekt en lid van de Jongelingencongregatie, Voorzitter van den Kerkraad en vereeremerkt met "Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice".

De Heer had hem met zijn mildste gaven verrijkt : een vredelievend opbeurend karakter, een door-en-door goed en edel hart, een schrandere geest, een fijne opmerkingsgave, een boeiend schrijverstalent, en dat alles bezield door een diepgevoelde godsvrucht.

Hij was de christen volkskunstenaar, die het volk doet zien wat het niet ziet, en dat het toch dient te zien, omdat het zijn schat is en zijn schoonheid ; — Volkskunstenaar die het volk doet waardeeren wat het niet waardeert, en toch dient te waardeeren, omdat het zijn hoogste levensbezit is ; — Volkskunstenaar, die in 's volks plaats voelt wat het dient te voelen, en het te lezen geeft in gezonde, verkwikkende, christelijk-opbeurende boeken.

Overtuigd katholiek van de daad, zocht hij zijn kracht in de dagelijksche Communie zoolang zijn gezondheid het hem toeliet ; en tijdens zijn langdurige ziekte was het een vreugde en een feest telkenmale O. L. Heere hem gedragen werd.

Den dood zag hij stap voor stap naderen, en hij bereidde zich voor in diepen ernst en volle onderwerping aan Gods wil.

Toen zijn ziel gelouterd was in het vuur der beproeving, is hij zachtjes heengegaan... O. L. Vrouw, die hij zoo teeder beminde, leidde hem binnen in de glorie van haar Goddelijken Zoon, in het rijk der opperste Kunst en Schoonheid.

Duurbare Zuster, God loone u voor uw trouwe liefde en moederlijke zorgen. — Familieleden en allen die mijn vrienden waart, vergeet mij niet in uw H. Communies en gebeden. Vooral gij, mijn Neef Priester, en al mijn goede vrienden Priesters, gedenk mij aan het Altaar des Heeren.

H. Hart van Jesus, ik heb betrouwen in U. (300 d. afl.)

geboren te Becelaere, op 13 Maart 1888 en godvruchtig in den Heer ontslapen te Staden, op 10 Maart 1946.
Getroost en gesterkt door de Sakramenten der stervenden.

Zonder menschelijk opzicht, diep gemeend en echt eenvoudig, zoo was hij een Christen uit één stuk, steeds bereid voor het goede, gansch gegeven aan Gods Heiligen Wil. - Schoon was zijn Godsvrucht tot de kleine Heilige Theresia. Steeds gingen zijn blikken naar haar beeld, tot in de laatste oogenblikken van zijn brekend leven. Thans zal hij met Haar van uit den hemel een regen van rozen over de zijnen laten neerkomen.

Een ware roeping was het voor hem de jeugd op te voeden.- De velen die bij meester Joseph schoolgingen, zullen getuigen van zijn strenge goedheid en vaderlijke wijsheid, van zijn taaien wil en zijn belanglooze bezorgdheid. - Als schoolbestuurder was hij voor zijn ambtgenooten een toonbeeld van plichtsbesef en verantwoordelijkheidszin. - Met de vele talenten van zijn fijn besnaarde ziel heeft hij gewoekerd. Waar hij kwam bracht hij vreugde - zijn loon zal honderdvoudig zijn.

Maar boven dit alles stond zijn « Vader zijn » - zijn kroost was zijn eenige trots. - En nu, wanneer de tijd van rusten was aangebroken - wanneer zijn kinderen, aan zijn sterke vaderhand stilaan het echte leven ingingen, wanneer hij waarlijk kon genieten van de liefde en de zorg van zijn echtgenoote, roept O.L.Heer hem bij Zich « op Eeuwige Rust ». Het geluk om een priesterzoon moest hemelsch voor hem zijn.

Vader uw schitterend voorbeeld zal vóór ons oprijzen als een onvergetelijke plicht U te volgen. Samen met U zal moeder nu tweemaal voor ons zorgen. Wij danken U. In de H. Mis en Communie zullen we voor U bidden.

Hij was lid van den H. Hartebond en van de Confrerien van 't H. Sacrament en de H. Barbara.

Gezegend zij de Heer, die mij vermaande over mijnen aanstaanden dood !

Al zijne krachten waren uitgeput, zijn vleesch was afgeteerd en zijn kwaal was zonder hulp. Maar omdat hij in zijn lijden tot den Heer riep, heeft God zijn aardsche leven met een beter verwisseld.

Gedienstig voor iedereen en aangenaam in zijnen omgang, won hij de genegenheid zijner medeburgers. In zijn laatste levensdagen heeft hij de leemten overdacht en alle aardsche oneenigheid over boord geworpen ; vooraleer zijne ziel het huis harer eeuwigheid binnentrad, was hij zijnen Schepper indachtig.

Heere, laat nu uwen dienaar in vrede tot U komen !
(Luc., II, 29.)

Tot weerziens ! mijn dierbare broeders, bloedverwanten en vrienden, en weest mijne ziel in uwe gebeden indachtig.

Heb dank, mijn trouwe dienstmaagd, voor uw toewijding en onvermoeibare offervaardigheid. Gij hebt mijn laatste levensdagen dragelijker gemaakt.

In de vrede van Christus rust :
DE HEER
ANTOON VAN WALLEGHEM
echtgenoot van
Mevrouw MARIA VAN DOORNE
DOCTOR IN DE GENEESKUNDE
GEWEZEN BURGEMEESTER

geboren te Zonnebeke op 26 april 1900 en godvruchtig overleden in de H. Hartkliniek te Roeselare op 11 juni 1967, gesterkt door de sakramenten van de zieken en de apostolische zegen « in articulo mortis ».

Toen kwam een Samaritaan, die op reis was, bij hem die geslagen was en gewond. Hij zag hem, kreeg medelijden en gaf hem de beste zorgen. Wie lijkt u de naaste te zijn ? De wetgeleerde antwoordde : die hem barmhartigheid betoond heeft. En Jezus sprak : « Ga dan en doe evenzo » (Lucas-evg.)

Als wij, bij het heengaan van dokter Van Walleghem, een terugblik werpen op heel zijn dokterspraktijk, kunnen wij dit stuk evangelie in volle waarheid op zijn leven toepassen.

Hij was een « humane » dokter. Hij zag in zijn ambt eerder een roeping dan een beroepskeuze. Hij had niet alleen open oog voor de ziekte, maar met hartelijke zorg en genegenheid behandelde hij de « mens ». Steeds met een vriendelijk gezicht en een bemoedigend woord, wist hij zijn patiënten te benaderen en op te beuren. Hij had niet de tijd om aan zichzelf te denken, hij wilde zich totaal geven aan zijn zieken en de mensen die zijn hulp behoefden.

Hij volgde hierin het voetspoor van zijn vader, die als dokter een graaggeziene figuur was in de streek van Zonnebeke.

Hij was een goede huisvader. Ondanks zijn druk beroepsleven, gaf hij volle aandacht aan zijn gezin. Als vader wist hij zich verantwoordelijk om aan zijn kinderen een degelijke leiding en opvoeding te geven. Met échte bekommernis en ongeëvenaarde goedheid heeft hij die taak waargenomen. Opvoeden is voorgaan en zelf doen. Niet op sensationele wijze, maar zonder kompromis, heeft hij zijn geloof persoonlijk in zijn leven weten te verweven. Dagelijks ontmoette hij de Heer in zijn heilig Offer ; daar voedde hij zich met de « menslievendheid » van Hem die de volmaakte Geneesheer is, tot heil en genezing van de mensen.

Hij was een « goed mens ». Dit mochten zijn huisgenoten en familie ervaren ; ook zijn medeburgers en vrienden konden in hem zijn « medemenselijkheid » waarderen. « Wie goed doet, bidt altijd » (S. Aug.).

Dierbare echtgenote, heb dank voor uw innig medeleven en uw steun, zowel bij mijn dokterspraktijk als mijn vaderlijke taak. In alles hebben wij lief en leed gedeeld, om de wil van de Vader te doen, ook nu... bij mijn heengaan.

Lieve kinderen, « mijn vreugde en mijn kroon » de vele blijken van uw liefde en tedere zorgen, vooral tijdens mijn ziekte, hebben mij goed gedaan. God zegene en beware U !

Vader, wij danken U : om uw geloof en uw liefde, om het getuigenis van uw schoon leven. Help ons nu, dat wij uw voetspoor mogen volgen. Wij zijn fier op u, vader. Wij danken de Heer dat wij uw kinderen zijn.

In de Heer leefde hij, met Hem stierf hij, door Hem zal hij verrijzen !

Verwanten en vrienden, bidden wij met de Kerk voor elkander.

DE FAMILIE BETUIGT HAAR ERKENTELIJKHEID VOOR UW MEDELEVEN EN UW GEBEDEN.

Ik zal mij een trouwen Priester verwekken, die zal handelen volgens mijn hart en mijn geest.
1. Reg. II. 15.

PRIESTER : dat was hij ten volle, bezield met een vurige liefde tot Jezus in zijn H. Sakrament. Tot dien Liefdevorst leidde Hij, begeesterend, zijn volk, van klein tot groot veelvuldig aan de H. Tafel.

PRIESTER : met hart en ziel verknocht aan zijn kerk en aan de hem toevertrouwde kudde.

PRIESTER : op den kansel, om er te spreken van Jezus' liefde en wederliefde te wekken ; bij de kleinen, om ze in en door de kristen leer, Jezus' liefde te doen voelen en ze er voor te ontvlammen ; om met gouden hart de zielen hem toevertrouwd te leiden en er velen tot s' Heeren dienst op te voeren.

PRIESTER : door zijne diepe en kinderlijke godsvrucht tot onze Lieve Vrouw van Lourdes, wier vereering hij steeds bij zijn volk wist aan te vuren en uit te breiden.

PRIESTER : in zijn ziekelijkheid ; aan Jezus en met Hem lijdend, zich zelf offerend, in volle onderwerping aan s' Heeren wil, voor zijn kudde.

Zijn minzaamheid en goedheid wonnen de harten : lijden deed hij, opbeurend, met wie leed, en door luimige gezelligheid en vriendelijken omgang, hield hij eigen lijden schuil.

Dierbare Broeder, Zusters en Bloedverwanten en gij allen die mij zoo verkleefd waart, dank om uw genegen zorgen ; de dood kan ons hier scheiden maar niet de banden breken van wederzijdsche liefde. Gedenkt mij voort in uwe gebeden en Ik zal voor u zorgen.

Eerweerde Medebroeders in het Priesterschap, vergeet mij niet aan het altaar des Heeren.

Zoet Hert van Jezus, wees mijne liefde! 300 d. afl.
Zoet Hert van Maria, wees mijne zaligheid. 300 d. afl.

echtgenoot van Vrouw Romanie DEMEULENAERE
geboren te Zonnebeke den 26 Augustus 1856, en er overleden den 6 Maart 1927, voorzien van de laatste H.H. Sacramenten. — Hij was lid van het Aartsbroederschap van 't Heilig Sakrament, van den bond van 't H. Hert en van 't genootschap van den H. Vincentius.

Hij wiens dood wij betreuren, heeft altijd een voorbeeldig leven geleid, dit getuigen van hem al degene die hem kenden; hij was door en door kristelijk, zonder beslag, maar ook zonder menschelijk opzicht: dagelijks, zoolang hij kon, ging hij ter H. Mis, en stipt iederen eersten Vrijdag ontving hij de H. Communie ter eere van het H. Hert.

Hij was onberispelijk in zijnen handel en wandel, gedienstig en vriendelijk met iedereen ; in een woord : een rechtschapen man. Eene onvoorziene ziekte heeft zijn kloek gestel verteerd, en bitter herteleed heeft zijne krachten ondermijnd. Bij het naderen van den dood bleef hij kalm en gelaten, vol onderwerping aan den heiligen Wil van God ; « uw Wil geschiede op aarde als in den hemel » 't waren van zijne laatste woorden.

De gedachtenis aan dien voorbeeldigen kristen, aan dien verdienstvollen medeburger zal in zegening blijven bij de menschen ; van den rechtveerdigen Rechter heeft hij zeker deze troostende woorden mogen hooren : Kom goede en getrouwe dienaar, treed binnen in de vreugde van uwen Heer.

Duurbare Echtgenoote, vroeger dan we dachten moeten wij scheiden, Gods H. Wil geschiede ! uwe goede zorgen hebben mij getroost, uwe vurige gebeden hebben mij gesterkt, ik dank er u om, vaarwel tot in den Hemel.

Beminde Broeders, Zuster en Bloedverwanten, mijne dood dompelt u in droefheid, doch troost u eensdaags vinden we elkander terug om nooit meer te scheiden. Vergeet mij niet in uwe gebeden.

In alle omstandigheden wist hij de priesters ten dienste te staan door zijnen invloed en zijne welwillende medewerking.

Met onvermoeibare zorgen ijverde hij opdat Pater Lievens eindelijk zijn standbeeld op Moorslede zou hebben en zijne groote bekommernis was, dat de gemeente aan het H. Hart van Jesus zou toegewijd worden ; daarom spaarde hij geen moeite om aan het feest den grootsten luister mogelijk te geven. Wie zou gedaan hebben wat hij gedaan heeft om de eenvoudigste der medeburgers uit hunnen nood en verlegenheid te helpen !

Met wat geduld aanhoorde hij hen, en wat al tijd en zorgen heeft hij niet besteed om aan eenieder voldoening te geven !

Hoevelen zijn er niet die hem dank verschuldigd zijn voor eenen dienst, die hem nochtans veel moeite gekost had ?

De Heer moge hem overvloedig loonen voor al het goede dat hij aan zijne medeburgers gedaan heeft.

Op het laatste van haar leven is deze goede vrouw zeer beproefd geweest ; zij heeft ellendige dagen voor erfdeel gehad en vele droevige nachten doorstaan. Toch heeft ze nooit geklaagd en met onderwerping en verduldigheid, putte ze gedurig nieuwe krachten in het gebed.

Haar kwaal was zonder hoop op genezing, zij zag den dood komen, verschrikte niet en hoopte op een beter leven. God heeft zijne dienares verhoord en met een kinderlijk betrouwen op Maria en met volle onderwerping aan Gods Wil heeft zij dit leven zachtjes verlaten.

They had, however, many more children. The family still remembers that Eudoxie has been pregnant 18 times. We found 13 registered births:

Daniël Abel Lesage (Moorslede July 15, 1911 - Deerlijk, April 29, 1988).
Every child is described in subsequent sections, while Irma Lesage is described in Chapter 45.2 as the wife of Michel Declercq and the author's grandmother.

64.7.1 Cyrille Camille Lesage

64.7.1.1 Introduction

Cyrille Camille Lesage (Westrozebeke, May 28, 1890 - Paris, March 17, 1916) was the first child of Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens. Born at his paternal grandparents' home in Westrozebeke, the newlywed couple resided there until the birth of their third child. Subsequently, they relocated to Moorslede, near the train station at Statiestraat 518, where they had eight more children. In July 1912, the family moved to a farm in Ledegem at Kortwagenstraat 33.
The family's circumstances were dramatically altered by the outbreak of World War I in the summer of 1914. By this time, Cyrille had enlisted in the Belgian military and was committed to defending his nation against the German invasion. The Lesage family faced significant upheaval during his intense engagement in the defense efforts near Antwerp. Emile Lesage and his son Paul remained in Ledegem, while Eudoxie Lammens relocated to Oudezeele in Northern France with the other children. They found refuge with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, a home designated as number 49 on the refugee list during the war.
Cyrille Lesage's military career began in 1910 when he joined the Belgian army as part of the Militien 1910, serving in the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied, 3rd Army Division. He re-enlisted on July 30, 1914, in the 4/II Division, 2nd Regiment of the Chasseurs à Pied. Lesage witnessed significant events on the Western Front, including the German bombardment of Ypres in April 1915, marked by the first large-scale use of chlorine gas.
On April 22, 1915, at 17:30, German forces released 168 tons of chlorine gas from 5730 cylinders, creating a devastating yellow-green fog that drifted towards Allied positions between Steenstraat and Poelkapelle. The gas attack impacted British, French, and Belgian units, but a swift counterattack by Allied forces prevented the Germans from capitalizing on the breach in the lines.
Cyrille was exposed to gas attacks multiple times, including a significant attack on August 12, 1915, at Noordschote, near Lo-Reninge. By August 21, 1915, his health had deteriorated, leading to his evacuation from the front lines due to severe lung problems. Lesage succumbed to tuberculosis in a Paris hospital on March 17, 1916.
In recognition of his service, Cyrille Lesage was awarded two Chevrons for his one year and seven months of duty at the Western Front.
Posthumously, he received several honors: Chevalier de l'Ordre de Léopold II (April 20, 1917), Croix de Guerre (April 20, 1917), and the Yser Medal, 'Gevochten aan de Yser van 17 tot 31 Oktober 1914'[13], commemorating his involvement in the Yser battle from October 17 to 31, 1914. Cyrille Lesage is interred at the Père Lachaise Cemetery in Paris, within the Belgian War Monument, ensuring his sacrifice and memory endure.

64.7.1.2 His Birth

Cyrille Camille Lesage was born in 1890, in Figure 64.78 in Westrozebeke.

64.7.1.3 His Early life

64.7.1.4 His Military Career Before WWI

Cyrille Lesage was recruited, shown in Figure 64.80, on June 21, 1910, at the 36th canton of West Flanders in the village of Moorslede.
From October 3 onwards, he was considered a military.
Photographic evidence in Figure 64.81 of 1911 proves that Cyrille first joined the 1st Chasseurs 'a Pied at Charleroi ('1ste Jagers te voet'). In documents, however, established later, there is only a mention of the 2nd Chasseurs 'a Pied. So we assume he did not stay long in the first division and moved quickly to the second division at Mons, as shown in Figure 64.82.
His military files covering WWI are shown in Figures 64.83, 64.84, 64.85, 64.86, 64.87 and 64.88. A picture of when he was recruited for WWI is also shown in Figure 64.88.
In 1913, before he ended his regular term as a soldier, he received a military identification card with picture and matriculation number 51639 of the '2e Régiment de Chasseurs 'a Pied, II Bataillon, 4 Compagnie.' One can see that his address was in Moorslede at the time.

Rumbeke — Dr. J. Tanghe & Zoons.

Figure 64.77: The death of Cyrille and Hector Lesage, Belgian military and sons of Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens, is undoubtedly the most significant event in the lives of this family and has been the center of numerous discussions in the family and visits to the Western WWI front, throughout the 20th century. Cyrille is described in Chapter 64.7.1, Hector in Chapter 64.7.6. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 64.80: Military registration of Cyrille Camiel Lesage, in lichting van 1910, Nationale Militie, Province de la Flandre Occidentale, 36e militiekanton, gemeente Moorslede. He was a farmer, born in Westrozebeke on May 28, 1890. He was 175 cm tall. His parents were farmers, Emile Theophile Lesage, born in Westrozebeke, and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens, born in Zonnebeke. He had resided at least one year in Moorslede before his recruitment. His parents also lived in Moorslede. He was the eldest son. His recruitment date was February 15, 1910, after which he was sent back home for 82 days to join the army on June 24, 1910, in the Regiment of the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied.

23 MONS Caserne du 2me chasseurs à pied

It proves that the family would move to Ledegem just before the onset of WWI. His height was 178.1 m, which was quite tall at that time.

Concerning his face, the document mentions:
Visage: ovale (Oval face) front: petit (small forehead) yeux: gris (grey eyes) nez: petit (small nose)
bouche: moyenne (average mouth) menton: allongé (long chin, which he had inherited from the de Patin ancestors) cheveux: châtains (brown hair) sourcils: idem (brown eyebrows)
signes particulier: non (no other particular signs)

His military records in Figure 64.89 further show that on March 11, 1912, he was granted unlimited time-off at his home in Moorslede, 'Rue Statiestraat 513,' in the district of Ypres, canton Zonnebeke.

On July 3, 1912, he returned to the army and received unlimited time off on June 12, again at Moorslede, 'Rue de la station 518' at the district of Ypres, Canton Zonnebeke.

On June 13, 1912, as we interpret the data correctly, he changed residence to Ledegem in the District of Kortrijk, Canton of Menen. Then, on May 7, 1913, he returned to the army and was granted unlimited time off again on June 2. We assume this was the end of his regular military career. Later, he would return to the army when Germany declared war on Belgium in 1914.

Based on the pictures we have discovered, we assume he got engaged between June 1913 and July 1914. We do know, however, that he is never married.

64.7.1.5 His Civil Life just Before WWI

Once poised to follow in his parents' footsteps and become a farmer, Cyrille Lesage found his destiny irrevocably altered by the tides of history. Before the eruption of World War I, the summer of 1914 shone brightly upon a prosperous land brimming with promise and hope. However, this idyllic existence was swiftly shattered, plunging Cyrille and countless other Europeans into the harrowing depths of conflict and despair. The poignant images of Cyrille captured just before the war serve as a haunting reminder of the innocence lost, as shown in Figure 64.90.

64.7.1.6 His Military Career During WWI

Cyrille Lesage, a distinguished soldier of World War I, demonstrated exceptional bravery during the Yser Battle between October 17 and October 31, 1914. He was posthumously awarded the Yser Medal by Royal Decree 917.2 for his bravery on April 19, 1921. In addition to this honor, he received a posthumous knighthood, becoming a Chevalier of the Ordre de Léopold II. He was also awarded the War Cross (Croix de Guerre) on April 20, 1917.

Lesage's military service was further recognized posthumously with the conferment of two front stripes (chevrons) on October 20, 1922. The Headquarters of the 2nd Chasseurs awarded these à Pied, which had relocated to Charleroi in 1919, having previously been stationed at Mons. On August 21, 1915, Lesage was evacuated from the Yser front due to illness but subsequently returned to duty. Tragically, he succumbed to lung tuberculosis at the Hospital Roi Albert I in Paris, located at 2 Rue d'Arcole in the 4th arrondissement, on March 17, 1916. He was initially interred at Ivry on March 20, 1916, and was later reburied in the Belgian soldiers' monument at Père Lachaise Cemetery in Paris. His death certificate records that he was a Chasseur à Pied in the 5th Division of the Army, unmarried, and a resident of Ledegem.

Lesage's military journey is intricately intertwined with the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied, his regiment. The 2nd Chasseurs à Pied, with its rich history, traces its roots back to the Frankish corps and was officially established on March 30, 1831, by decree of Baron Surlet de Chokier, Regent of Belgium. The regiment's volunteers played a pivotal role in defending Mexico in 1864 at the request of Emperor Maximilian and Empress Charlotte of Belgium. They also contributed significantly to the protection of the Belgian Congo under King Leopold II.

During World War I, the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied displayed extraordinary heroism, particularly at the Willebroek canal's Pont-Brûlé in Eppegem, where Corporal Léon Trésignies led under intense German fire. The regiment engaged in several significant battles, including the gallant fight at Jodoigne on August 16, 1914, the defense of Antwerp's fortresses, and actions along the Nete River. The regiment's notable participation in the Yser Battle from October 17 to 31, 1914, saw two battalions distinguish themselves at Diksmuide, Oudstuivekenskerke, and Pervijze. Post-1916, the regiment continued its commendable service, although Lesage was no longer part of these endeavors due to his untimely death.

After World War I, the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied was stationed in Charleroi and remained there until World War II. During the Second World War, they played a critical role in combat along the Lys River, attempting to impede the German advance.

Figure 64.91: These are shares in the Railway industry, dated 1912. The Belgians were very proud of their railways. Therefore, it must have been painful to use them to run into the Germans or when they noticed they employed them to transport goods and military during WWI. Also, after two world wars, trust in the Railway system survived. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

The heroic journey of Cyrille Lesage and the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied is meticulously detailed in Commandant Willy Breton's book.[14] This source, among others, provides invaluable insights into their courageous service during the tumultuous years of World War I.

64.7.1.6.1 The Mobilization On July 29, 1918, the Belgian government mobilized its army. The Guillaume Barracks in Mons, also known as the Caserne des P'tits Chasseurs, became a focal point of activity. Until this point, the inhabitants of Mons had not believed their soldiers would ever need to fight the Germans. They assumed, as in 1870, that tensions between France and Germany would be resolved on battlefields outside Belgium.

However, early on August 1, 1914, the government announced a general army mobilization. This proclamation brought a sudden and grave concern to the inhabitants, who now faced the imminent possibility of conflict. At the barrack gates, poignant scenes unfolded as mothers, wives, and loved ones bid farewell to soldiers joining or rejoining the Chasseurs à Pied. The officers could scarcely hide their apprehension regarding the seriousness of the situation. Despite the ominous atmosphere, the soldiers displayed remarkable courage. According to Breton, they expressed defiance with statements like,

"So what? Let them come. We guarantee that we will properly welcome them"!

Clearly, the threat would come from the Germans, not the French.

This German threat had been a common topic of conversation in the months leading up to August. Consequently, the Belgians were not surprised by the prospect of a sudden German invasion. Yet, due to Belgium's neutrality, its army had to defend every border, including that with France. On August 1 and 2, the 2nd and 5th Chasseurs formed the 16th Brigade and marched south towards Mons. Although many did not fully grasp the severity of the situation, there was widespread curiosity about the southward movement, as an invasion from France seemed unlikely.

Nevertheless, the 2nd and 5th Chasseurs à Pied took defensive positions south of Mons, guarding the canal from Mons to Condé-sur-l'Escaut and the Canal du Centre. They also monitored every road originating from Valenciennes, Bavay, Maubeuge, and Beaumont. Similarly, the 3rd and 6th Chasseurs à Pied from the Tournai garrison guarded the territory between Valenciennes and Lille.

The surveillance of the French border was abruptly interrupted. On August 3, the situation changed dramatically. Meanwhile, the Chasseurs enjoyed a brief period of joy, welcomed by enthusiastic inhabitants along their route. When questioned by concerned civilians, the soldiers assured them they were merely practicing large maneuvers.

On August 3, soldiers near the German border received news that the German army had issued an ultimatum demanding free passage through Belgium to France. According to Breton, no Belgian considered acquiescing to this demand, understanding that it unequivocally meant war. The announcement stirred immediate hatred toward the Germans.

The 2nd Chasseurs à Pied were eager to move east and confront the German invaders. Some officers, reflecting this urgency, exclaimed,

"Bastards!What the hell are we still doing here?'

Orders soon arrived for the entire 16th Brigade to embark on trains from Mons to Perwez, where the 5th Division of the Belgian army would assemble. On the evening of August 3, the soldiers abandoned their surveillance positions and returned to Mons, ready to depart by 10 p.m. Led by General Geerts and preceded by the fanfare of the 2nd Chasseurs, the troops marched from the barracks to the train station via la Grand Rue and la Rue de la Station. They marched to the tune of Doudou, the famous song of the inhabitants of Mons, who greeted them with enthusiastic support. The lyrics of Doudou are :

Refrain
C' est l' Doudou c' est l' mama
C' est l' poupée, poupée, poupée.
C' est l' Doudou, c' est l' mama
C' est l' poupée St Georg' qui va.
Les gins du rempart riront comm' des kiards

CAPORAL LÉON TRÉSIGNIES, 2e COMPAGNIE, 3e BATAILLON DU 2e CHASSEURS A PIED

Citation officielle à l'ordre du jour de l'armée du 15 Septembre 1914

Ce militaire s'est offert à son commandant pour traverser à la nage le canal de Willebroeck, afin de glisser le tablier du pont qui devait se manœuvrer de la rive fortement occupée par l'adversaire.

A été frappé mortellement pendant qu'il actionnait le mécanisme du pont.

Sachant qu'il allait à la mort, le capl Trésignies, avec un courage d'une simplicité héroïque, a écrit son nom sur un bout de papier, qu'il remit à un sous-officier, puis partit pour ne plus revenir.

Ce caporal honore son régiment, l'armée et la nation.

Officieele melding aan de Legerdagorde van 15 September 1914

Deze militair heeft zich aan zijn commandt aangeboden om over 't kanaal van Willebroeck te zwemmen, ten einde de val der brug, die in beweging moest gebracht worden van op den door den vijand sterk bezetten oever, te doen zakken. Werd doodelijk getroffen terwijl hij 't mechanisme der brug in beweging stelde.

Wetend dat hij den dood te gemoed ging, schreef korp. Trésignies, met heldhaftigen eenvoudigen moed, zijn naam op een stukje papier, dat hij aan een onderofficier gaf en vertrok dan om niet meer weer te keeren.

Die korporaal is de eer van zijn regiment, van het leger en van de natie.

Soldiers faced the horror of relentless artillery bombardments, debilitating diseases, and the grim reality of trench warfare. Among the Belgian soldiers enduring these harsh conditions were Cyrille Lesage and Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe, who bravely held their ground in this war-torn region.*

The soldiers, as Breton recounts, set off with a resolute determination to confront 'the pigs who had declared war.' This was a time of unbridled patriotism, with hearts brimming with love for their country. In the square before the station, a throng gathered to shake hands, embrace, and voice their admiration. A similar scene unfolded within the train station, marking the beginning of a journey that would test their mettle and reshape their lives.

Amidst this, thunder and lightning cracked through the warm, humid atmosphere of the day. At midnight, under torrential rain, the first train departed amidst a cacophony of cries, with the crowd shouting, 'Vive la Belgique, Leve de Koning!'[15]

None anticipated that the bloodiest war was on the horizon, one that would claim the lives of countless young and vigorous men. This scenario was replicated across Europe that month. Young men, in their innocence, envisioned war as a football match: intense, brief, and exhilarating, a stark contrast to the grim reality that awaited them.

Upon the trains' arrival at Manage, the frantic activity of the preceding hours yielded to a tranquil silence. Exhausted, many soldiers dozed off in the stifling train. Summer's early dawn light illuminated the horizon as the first convoy reached Tamines. They proceeded to Ham-Sur-Sambre to switch tracks towards Gembloux. Midway, the 16th Brigade was ordered to disembark between the Sambre River and Gembloux, specifically at Mazy, where the main road runs from Namur to Nivelles. A drizzly rain greeted the troops as they disembarked, still groggy. At Mazy, near the road to Namur, the forces convened. Early arrivals rested while waiting for the others. By 9 a.m., all members of the 2nd and 5th Chasseurs had assembled, weapons and equipment in hand. They received final orders from General Geerts, Colonel Van Grasdorf, and Lieutenant-Colonel Sults.

The organized ranks of soldiers, with bayonets glinting in the morning sun, then dispersed, ready to face the unknown.

[15] This means, 'Long live Belgium! Long live our King!'

The Chasseurs marched to Saussin along the Route de Namur. From Saussin, they headed north towards Perwez via Saint-Denis[16] and Liernu. At Bovesse, they encountered soldiers from the 13th Line out of Namur. The distance from Mazy to Perwez is approximately 20 km. The soldiers arrived in Perwez by afternoon and spent the night there. In Perwez, local inhabitants warmly welcomed them. They were joined by Commander Reynaert's artillery (82nd, 83rd, and 84th batteries) and two sections with Hotchkiss machine guns under Lieutenants Boucau and Desmedt.

Thus, Perwez was occupied by the 16th Mixed Brigade, centrally located within the 5th Division's cantonments. The other two battalions, the 1st and 17th, were stationed at Aische-en-Refail and Liernu. The divisions moved towards the center of Namur, deploying outposts to Méhaigne, where they remained until August 7. That morning, the King of Belgium visited his troops, returning the Belgian flag to the 5th Chasseurs. He marched with the soldiers from Perwez to Grand-Rosières[17], subsequently joining the 16th Brigade in the area between Grand-Rosière and Noville-Sur-Méhaigne. His Majesty's presence boosted the soldiers' morale immensely.

The King's message was unequivocal:

"Do what you must do until the end!"

On August 6, news of the bloody repulse of the first German attacks in Liège spread rapidly, further bolstering the soldiers' spirits. The rumors of their heroics transformed into tales of invincibility, filling the soldiers with premature scents of glory and victory. Some even fantasized about marching east into Prussia to slay every German soldier with their bayonets.

However, on the afternoon of August 7, the 5th Division was ordered to leave Perwez and move to Jodoigne to position itself along the Gette River. The soldiers felt disheartened, believing that occupying the Gette would mean the Germans would flee, robbing them of their chance for direct confrontation.

64.7.1.6.2 The Gette River The next evening, the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied, strategically positioned near Grand-Rosière, left for Jodoigne-Souveraine. They were to remain in that region, allocated to the 5th Division, for 12 days. This district formed the army's right wing, tasked with defending the critical access road from Hannut to Leuven. To their left was the 1st Division, responsible for protecting the Tirlemont (Tienen) area. Between them was the 3rd Division, which had already engaged in combat in Liège and was eager to share its experiences with the other Belgian troops on either flank.

From the assembly point near the Hannut road occupied by the 16th Brigade, the Chasseurs, like many other Belgian troops, observed elements of the valiant 12th Brigade marching by. The Chasseurs, still reeling from the formidable enemy's mortal blows, admired the resilience of the so-called 'Iron Division.' This Division had withstood German assaults for two days and two nights, launching several decisive counterattacks despite suffering heavy casualties and eventually abandoning Liège.

The Chasseurs, like other Belgian troops, considered them victors, as they had proven it was possible to resist and strike back against the German superpower. This morale-boosting example encouraged others. The Belgians also relied on a belt of intact fortresses to further hinder the Germans. Once the troops had recovered, their uniforms still covered in dust from recent battles, they were eager to reengage the enemy. Having seen the Germans retreat on several occasions, the Belgians believed they could achieve victory. The enthusiasm of the Iron Division soon infected all the other troops, elevating morale significantly.

The Chasseurs praised the passing troops and took pride in the courage displayed by their comrades, though perhaps with a hint of envy for the glory showered upon them. The Chasseurs of Mons enjoyed the spectacle, noting the distinctive details of Uhlan helmets, spears, and guns held aloft by the passing ranks and the colorful display of artillerymen and horse riders.

Captain Tasner, inspired by the curiosity of his men, had a bright idea.

Riding a major's horse at a gallop, he approached the moving column and exchanged a beautiful 20-franc note for a German helmet brandished by an infantryman. He then proudly paraded in front of the Chasseurs, wearing the gloomy trophy, fist on hip. The Chasseurs, recovering from their surprise, laughed and clamored to see the helmet up close. This marked the Chasseurs' first trophy captured from the Germans, a moment that would be remembered and retold among the troops. The Chasseurs would fight fiercely and acquire many more trophies in subsequent bloody battles. Captain Tasner would earn a promotion on the battlefield and receive the Cross of the Legion of Honor at the Yser.

From August 8 onwards, a grueling and physically demanding period began for the Chasseurs and the rest of the Belgian army. Stationed as outposts at the Gette, they had to monitor every German movement and defend their line as long as possible, hoping for reinforcement from Allied forces positioned along the Meuse. Always on guard for surprise attacks, the Chasseurs endured exhausting conditions.

Meanwhile, stationed in Waremme under General de Witte's command, the cavalry division patrolled the areas around Liège and Visé. Although the Germans remained immobilized just below Liège, various army divisions took positions at every access road, ready to counter any enemy attack. In addition to the physically draining task, the high temperatures of August compounded their difficulties. Their haircuts, uniforms, shakos, and luggage were ill-suited for such harsh conditions. The soldiers, anxious and puzzled by the Germans' inactivity, were constantly alert, speculating about German plans. Minor skirmishes occurred regularly when Belgian and German cavalry patrols encountered each other.

Typically, the Germans fled swiftly, sometimes entire platoons retreating before a handful of Belgians. Occasionally, Belgians returned with German helmets, swords, and horses as trophies.

With their well-organized army adhering to a strict 'War by Timetable' doctrine, the Germans avoided confrontations unless prepared but struck decisively when they were. Day and night, the Chasseurs spotted German patrols, engaging them in gunfire. Sleep was scarce as they remained vigilant against potential attacks, often resting in the cold and subsisting on minimal rations. Cannon fire from the direction of Liège indicated that the city had not yet fallen, though details were scarce. At night, German bullets fired upon them kept the inexperienced Chasseurs in a state of constant fear and vigilance, struggling to rest under enemy fire.

On August 12, the situation abruptly changed when a rumor spread of an imminent German attack that morning. The area around Jodoigne, where the 2nd Chasseurs were stationed, soon came under cannon fire from the north. The artillery at Halen, where the Belgian cavalry of Waremme had been sent to Diest, countered a German assault consisting of 4000 cavalry, 2000 infantry, and 18 cannons.

The Battle of the Silver Helmets at Halen, which occurred on August 12, 1914, was meticulously planned based on the cavalry's previous successes under Frederick the Great. The engagement was designed for the German Fourth Cavalry Division to achieve a glorious victory with their sabers clanging. However, the Germans faced significant losses: twenty-four officers, 468 troops, and 843 horses fell during at least eight successive charges that day. According to the well-known Schlieffen Plan, the entire right wing of the Imperial German Army comprised just nine horse brigades; this battle effectively eliminated two of those brigades. The Battle of the Silver Helmets marked the end of a century-long cavalry tradition. It became clear that large-scale cavalry charges on the Western Front would never again be attempted. The artillery decisively defeated the Germans and four battalions of the 4th Mixed Brigade, commanded by General de Witte. The next day, 3000 German bodies were buried.

The Chasseurs realized that this German attack was a precursor to an assault on their positions, prompting heightened vigilance. Occasionally, a German airplane was visible in the sky.

In the days that followed, nothing occurred except for the passage of refugees fleeing the Germans. The local inhabitants were terrified due to rumors of atrocities committed by the Germans, such as those at Barchon, Evegnée, and Chaudfontaine. Subsequent accounts even understated the actual outrages and brutalities that transpired.

On August 17, a buildup of German troops in the vicinity became apparent. More refugees arrived, all declaring that the Germans were advancing.

Indeed, only a few hours later, on August 18, the Chasseurs of the 16th Brigade, stationed west of Jodoigne and protected by outposts on the Gette, heard the first cannon fire. The Germans attacked a reconnaissance squadron at Budingen and then along the frontline from Halen to Diest. Consequently, the 1st Division of the Belgian Army, located near Tienen, came under attack. Before noon, the 3rd Line Regiment at Haekendover was struck, followed by the 22nd Line Regiment from Neerlinter to Grimbe. The Chasseurs could hear the Belgian cannons returning fire. The positions of the 22nd Line Regiment at Sint-Margriete-Houtem and the 3rd Battalion near Grimbe faced the heaviest fire but remained calm. Near Jodoigne, only skirmishes occurred. A platoon of the 1st Company of the 2nd Chasseurs, guarding an elevated barricade on the main road just before Jodoigne, was suddenly attacked by a company of German cyclists. The first arrivals were shot down immediately, while the rest retreated. Lieutenant Delhaye, the platoon leader, was severely wounded with a perforated thigh and would not rejoin his troops until the Battle of the Yser in 1915.

The Chasseurs remained vigilant throughout the evening, hearing uninterrupted cannon fire from the direction of Tienen. By around 6 pm, the battlefield seemed to move west. The 22nd Line Regiment and sections of the 2nd had received orders to pull back after heroically defending their positions, and the 3rd Battalion at Grimbe also retreated.

The Germans captured Tienen and continued westward until they encountered the next line of defense. The 3rd Battalion of the 2nd Line Regiment took positions in trenches 900 meters northwest of the town, blocking the roads to Leuven and Sint-Joris-Winge. They were ordered to hold their positions at all costs. Despite heavy attacks and numerous losses, they placed the Germans under precise and effective fire. The Germans finally abandoned their attack on the trenches at 8:30 pm, retreating into the night.

Soon, Tienen, Sint-Margriete-Houtem, and Kontich were set ablaze due to the fierce battles on August 18. Hoegaarden was shelled in the evening and night, as were Sint-Katelijne-Waver and Aalst,[18] where elements of the 1st Mixed Brigade had assembled. The 2nd Chasseurs, still awaiting new orders west of Jodoigne, saw the villages burning in the distance. Mills and farms east of the Gette appeared like torches in the night sky.

Deep into the night, the exhausted Chasseurs were directed to Mélin[19] via Beauvechain.[20] There, they finally found some rest.

Early the following day, they and all other Belgian troops were ordered to retreat to Antwerp due to being vastly outnumbered by German forces. Through the morning mist, they marched to Willebroek via Hamme-Mille and Kortenberg, arriving on August 20 without any information on the reasons for their retreat. According to Breton, the soldiers remarked,

"Since we fall back, it is because the enemy is too strong, and we can do nothing against him!"

They heard cannon fire near Aarschot on the 19th, suggesting the Germans closely followed them during their retreat. They were discouraged and uncertain about the outcome of the conflict.

Fortunately, the Chasseurs were warmly welcomed by locals as they passed through various towns.

The knowledge of strong fortifications protecting them boosted their morale as they neared Antwerp. According to Breton, the Chasseurs, who referred to the Germans as Boches (translated as Moffen in Flemish), proclaimed,

"If the Boches ever come here, we will cook them!"

64.7.1.6.3 The Fortifications of Antwerp From August 21, 1914, the Chasseurs played a crucial role in the defense of Antwerp during the early stages of World War I. Positioned in the 4th sector, they manned the fortresses between the Schelde and Dijle rivers, integrating with the 5th Division of the Belgian army. The 16th Brigade, in particular, was tasked with the defense of Willebroek and both flanks of the Fortress of Breendonk, a pivotal stronghold designed to protect the approaches to Antwerp.

The area was systematically covered by guard posts, and the Chasseurs, true to their reputation, conducted extensive surveillance and patrols. They fearlessly explored the terrain between the fortresses and the villages of Malderen, Ramsdonk, and Kapelle-op-den-Bos, often coming face-to-face with German scouts. This was a perilous task, as these patrols frequently encountered German scouts, leading to regular exchanges of gunfire. The persistent threat of skirmishes added to the already tense atmosphere as the Chasseurs worked to gather intelligence and disrupt enemy movements.

The Chasseurs also faced the heart-wrenching sight of civilians fleeing towards Antwerp, seeking refuge from the advancing German forces. The Belgian army was in a precarious position, with the risk of being severed by the enemy. The German troops were establishing themselves along a line from Merchtem to Kessel-Loo,[21] threatening to encircle the Belgian defenders and isolate Antwerp from the rest of the country.

From August 24 onwards, the Chasseurs finally engaged the Germans directly, driven by a mixture of frustration and determination. They understood their pivotal role was not to achieve decisive victories against the numerically superior Germans but to hinder their advance as effectively as possible. This involved engaging in hit-and-run tactics, leveraging their mobility and familiarity with the local terrain to inflict maximum disruption.

One of the critical challenges for the Chasseurs was the ever-present danger of being forced to retreat to Antwerp and potentially being cut off from the rest of the Belgian army. This scenario was a grim reality that the Chasseurs had to prepare for, knowing that such a retreat could result in their isolation and possible destruction. Despite these dire circumstances, the Chasseurs were willing to accept this sacrifice, fully aware that their efforts might not bring personal glory. Still, they were vital for the broader strategic defense of Belgium.

The defense of Antwerp during this period was a testament to the resilience and bravery of the Belgian forces, particularly the Chasseurs. Though often overshadowed by larger battles, their actions played a significant role in delaying the German advance and providing critical time for the Allies to regroup. The Chasseurs' efforts exemplified the spirit of resistance that characterized Belgium's response to the German invasion in World War I, highlighting the importance of tenacity and tactical ingenuity in the face of overwhelming odds.

64.7.1.6.4 Eppeghem

The first significant engagement of the Chasseurs à Pied during the Great War was the Battle of Eppeghem, a clash steeped in ferocity and historical significance. In Breton's detailed account, one can almost see, smell, and feel the chaos and heroism that unfolded. Here, we will delve into the events at Eppeghem, drawing on Breton's vivid descriptions, and we will continue to do so for future battles.

The Belgian army tasked the 5th Division with a counteroffensive against the advancing German forces, aiming to push them back toward their homeland. Breton's narrative, written during the war, is marked by a palpable hostility towards the Germans, reflecting the sentiments of the time. His depiction of German atrocities, while harrowing, must be viewed in the context of wartime experiences and should not lead to blanket condemnations of all German soldiers or the German populace.

The battle commenced on the afternoon of August 24, under the command of Major Tack, supported by the 5th Artillery Division's cannons. The afternoon start time indicated a strategic move by the Belgians to catch the Germans off guard and prevent them from preparing for an attack the next day. The 3rd Chasseurs were dispatched to Impde (or Imde), where they faced heavy casualties. Concurrently, the 2nd Chasseurs moved to Nieuwenrode to support the 3rd, launching attacks towards Beyghem and Humbeek. This maneuver aimed to divert German attention, as the primary assault was planned for the center, involving other divisions.

Indeed, the 5th and 1st Divisions were positioned between the Willebroek Canal and the Zenne River, while the 6th Division advanced between the Zenne and the Dyle. On the left flank, the army aimed towards Boortmeerbeek, with the cavalry division pushing towards Haacht. This multi-pronged strategy sought to maximize the disruption of German forces.

The 2nd Chasseurs took up positions at Kapelle-op-den-Bos from Nieuwenrode, spending the night there to prepare for further actions on August 25. The following day, they participated in the 5th Division's assault on Eppeghem, advancing south towards Laar[22] and Spilt, following scouts closely. Breton describes their advance in gripping detail: moving step by step, attacking when possible, seeking shelter when necessary, sometimes upright, other times with their noses to the ground, firing upon the officer's whistle amidst a hail of bullets and bombs.

The German defenses in the area were disorganized, likely because their main forces were concentrated in Eppeghem itself. Both sides suffered heavy casualties. Breton poignantly captures the soldiers' psyche, who relied on their trust in comrades amidst the chaos of battle, following each other's footsteps as they pursued the Germans. This relentless pursuit culminated in the Belgian forces driving the Germans out of Eppeghem. That evening, the Belgian army reorganized, and it became clear that the Germans had also been expelled from Zemst and Weerde.

Major Verbrugghe (III/Chasseurs) was directed towards Pont-Brulé (Verbrande-Brug) on the opposite bank of the canal to join the main forces. Breton vividly recounts the Germans' wanton destruction, including the senseless wrecking of furniture and ornaments within homes, questioning how such actions aligned with the Germans' self-proclaimed cultural superiority ("hochkultur").

As the Chasseurs captured Eppeghem, villagers emerged from their shelters, bewildered and terrified, unsure of the unfolding events and fearful of a German return. Many fled to Antwerp, recounting German atrocities against civilians. Breton highlights a dramatic moment when a German soldier, captured by a Chasseur, pleaded for his life, crying, "Nicht kaput!" The Chasseur's retort, "Shut up your face, gangster! We are not murderers, not us!" underscores the moral high ground the Belgians perceived themselves to hold.

The night of August 25-26 was relatively calm. The Chasseurs of the 16th Brigade passed through the Eppeghem-Houtem region, while Verbrugghe's battalion was near Verbrande-Brug. However, the following day brought a fierce German counterattack. The Belgians, lacking the heavy weaponry of their adversaries, faced a daunting challenge. News of the Allied retreat from the Sambre River further complicated their position, compelling a strategic withdrawal towards Antwerp.

Nevertheless, intense skirmishes erupted at Houthem, forcing the Chasseurs of the 16th Brigade to take shelter at Eppeghem, where they faced heavy fighting. Despite a barrage of German artillery, the Belgians managed a controlled, step-by-step retreat. Captain Deudon's company endured severe losses from German shellfire, while Captain Pirard's company launched a courageous assault on German machine guns, vital for protecting the retreating forces. The bicycle company of Captain Demart, designed for efficient terrain reconnaissance, tenaciously held onto Eppeghem station on August 26, suffering a quarter of its men yet maintaining their position as long as possible.

The Battle of Eppeghem stands as a testament to the resilience and strategic understanding of the Belgian forces. Through Breton's evocative prose, the horror and heroism of the conflict are brought to life, offering a poignant reminder of the sacrifices made and the complex human dimensions of warfare.

64.7.1.6.5 Pont Brulé

On the evening of the 25th, the 2nd Chasseurs arrived at the Pont-Brulé [23]. The Germans awaited on the other side of the river, poised to prevent the Belgians from advancing. The Chasseurs planned to cross the bridge and pursue the Germans, but the enemy had fortified their position. They kept the bridge under heavy fire and had partially raised it, effectively blocking the Belgians' passage. The Germans did not destroy the bridge, intending to use it for their deeper invasion into Belgium and France, making the drawbridge strategically crucial.

Lowering the bridge was imperative, but the controls were located on the German side of the Willebroek canal. Having previously dug trenches on the Belgian side, the Germans had repositioned themselves on the far bank, leaving the bridge half-open. The 2nd Company of Captain Hellin's Battalion was tasked with this dangerous mission.

Sergeant-Major Wery led one platoon into the trench on the east bank, north of the bridge, while Lieutenant De Vos's detachment occupied the houses lining the road in front of the bridge. Delbauve's company covered the northern operation, while Bradfer's company shielded the southern approach. Major Verbrugghe was assigned to destroy the houses on the opposite side of the canal where the Germans were entrenched.

Aware of the Belgian preparations, the Germans called for reinforcements, signaled by releasing smoke[24]. Intense combat erupted between the bridge and Eppeghen. Despite fierce fighting, the half-raised bridge remained impassable. The Belgian forces were stalled until a courageous soldier, Trésignies, depicted in Figure 64.107 on page 1239, volunteered to swim across the canal and lower the bridge. A militia soldier from 1906, married with children, Trésignies successfully reached the other side and located the mechanism to lower the bridge. Tragically, he was shot dead in the attempt. His success came at the cost of his life, and it remains unknown if he saw the bridge lower before he died. The Germans swiftly reinforced their positions, and despite the bridge being lowered, the Belgians could not cross and were forced to retreat in an orderly manner, leaving Trésignies behind on the German side.

[24] Smoke was a sign that they requested reinforcements.

Breton notes that the Germans, recognizing his heroism, treated Trésignies's body respectfully, although this claim remains unverified. The Belgians were outraged by his death, fueling their resolve. The scene is depicted in Figure 64.108 on page 1239.

The Belgian army's staunch defense and the civilians' resistance against the German invasion deeply frustrated the enemy. Breton vividly describes, as do numerous history books, the atrocities committed by the Germans: civilian massacres, arson, and the destruction of homes in Visé, Liege, Andenne, Dinant, Eppeghem, Zemst, Weerde, Elewyt, and Hofstade. The German strategy sought territorial conquest without winning hearts and minds, a grievous miscalculation.

Meanwhile, the Belgian armed forces moved towards Dendermonde, while the 5th Division pushed south from the north towards Buggenhout, tasked with defending Antwerp. They relied on the numerous fortresses forming Antwerp's defensive belt. Within this context, Cyrille Lesage's 16th Brigade, assembled at Pullaer, west of Willebroek, was ordered on September 4 to shift to the defensive line near the Fortress of Breendonk.

Figures 64.93 and 64.94 show photographs of these fortresses.

The Belgian fortress line, robust and capable, posed a significant challenge to the advancing Germans, who retaliated by burning Kapelle-Op-Den-Bos and killing civilians, unable to accept the Belgians' determined defense of their homeland.

Cyrille Lesage and his company arrived at Breendonk, finding temporary respite and the opportunity to take photographs. Whether the photo in Figure 64.93 was taken immediately or after the subsequent assault on Kattemeuterbos remains uncertain.

For the next chapter in the saga of the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied, we turn to the Kattemeuterbos. Following their fortification at Breendonk, the Chasseurs were dispatched to this forest, which straddles the Willebroek canal in Grimbergen and Zemst, where the Laarbeek Creek originates. In 1914, a fierce battle had already been waged here. The Germans had fortified the forest, creating a formidable defense. The Allies needed to seize control of the forest to protect their advancing troops in Eppegem and Weerde.

The assault began with the Allies bombarding the forest's western edge, followed by an infantry charge. The Belgian forces faced a harrowing advance, crossing several hundred meters of open fields under heavy German fire. Despite significant casualties, they moved men and artillery into the forest, eventually wresting control from the Germans.

The rationale behind this daring counterattack lay in the broader context of events in France. The Allies, under General Joffre, aimed to deliver a decisive blow to the Germans before September 6. This plan culminated in the Battle of the Marne, where Manoury's army struck von Kluck's forces. The Belgian offensive was intended to prevent German reinforcements from reaching the Marne, compelling German troops already moving south to divert back towards Antwerp. Additionally, a German division en route to the Aisne River was immobilized for two days, determining whether to proceed south or return north. The Belgian actions played a crucial role in safeguarding Paris from a German takeover in September 1914.

Given this context, it is fitting that Cyrille Lesage, who perished in 1916, is memorialized at Père Lachaise in Paris.

Breton's account provides further details of the attack on the Kattemeuterbos. On September 9, the Belgian offensive against the Germans commenced. The left-wing secured the Dyle and the Demer rivers, while the 5th Division departed from the 4th sector and moved southward. Most of the forces advanced westward to the right bank of the Willebroek canal, then proceeded south. The 16th Brigade operated near the canal, with the 17th Brigade focusing on Eppeghem.

On September 10, the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied encountered the enemy along the geographical line of Nieuwenrode-'t Sas-Spilt-Bosch. This confrontation swiftly escalated into a bitter fight, as the Germans were well-prepared and organized after their previous encounters at Eppeghem. The Germans, upon spotting a Chasseur, immediately opened fire with heavy machine guns. The Chasseurs, seasoned by their earlier experiences, were undeterred despite the intense combat. Rain poured down as the Germans lay in the mud, carefully aiming at the advancing Belgians. By evening, the Chasseurs had successfully pushed back the Germans along the entire line, with the 16th Brigade, including Cyrille Lesage, facing a particularly well-organized enemy beyond.

The Germans consistently selected advantageous defensive positions throughout the war, such as higher ground, dry areas, or forests. They had entrenched themselves within the Kattemeuterbos, and Cyrille Lesage's company confronted a well-concealed and formidable foe within this dense woodland. Ironically, four years later, Cyrille's brother Hector would face a similar ordeal in the Houthulst forest during the final Belgian offensive. Tragically, Hector would be killed at Jonkershove, whereas Cyrille would survive the ordeal at Kattemeuterbos.

The battle for the Kattemeuterbos spanned two harrowing days. This forest squeezed between the canal and residential dwellings, had to be taken head-on, as flanking maneuvers were impossible. The combat was so fierce, and the casualties so numerous, that the Chasseurs shivered for months at the memory. The actual assault on the forest began on September 11. By nightfall, the ground in front of the forest was soaked with blood and littered with the bodies of fallen soldiers. Under the cover of darkness, the Belgians retrieved their dead.

The following day, the Chasseurs faced a reinforced enemy. The Germans had formed a robust front line extending from the Kattemeuterbos to Leuven, bolstered by all available military resources. This forest held significant strategic value, drawing concentrated German attention. The Chasseurs of Mons, including Cyrille Lesage, endured relentless attacks yet maintained their positions from the forest to Eppeghem despite facing heavy artillery and machine gun fire. The Chasseurs inflicted substantial casualties on the Germans, but their losses were considerable. The forest capture was only possible with the crucial support of Belgian artillery, particularly the 84th battery under Captain Cheville. The intense artillery and German gunfire claimed the lives of numerous Belgian soldiers, officers, and horses.

By September 13, the Belgians concluded the battle, recognizing the impossibility of pushing the Germans further back. The primary objective was to compel the Germans to reinforce their lines near Antwerp rather than deploying all their forces south towards Paris. The Chasseurs successfully achieved this goal, forcing the enemy into a defensive posture, allowing the Belgians to withdraw without further losses or German assaults.

This narrative also highlights significant tactical errors from a modern perspective. The Belgian and French armies often relied on defending with fortresses or along rivers. In contrast, the Germans effectively utilized various defensive positions, such as forests, private homes, barns, and small ditches. During the Second World War, the Germans applied this knowledge to rapidly conquer vast territories by neutralizing fortresses.

An enemy in fortified positions can be targeted directly, but an enemy dispersed across forests, homes, ditches, hills, rocks, and barns presents a far more complex challenge. Effective warfare necessitates optimal use of natural terrain, which varies widely.

It is noteworthy that King Leopold III recognized this principle. At the onset of WWII, the Belgian army, constrained by political directives, focused on administrative borders rather than natural ones, failing to learn from the events of 1914. Later in 1914, the Belgian army effectively utilized natural terrain by inundating the landscape, a tactic historically employed during the wars between the Spanish Netherlands and the Northern Netherlands, as well as during conflicts with France.

After the soldiers withdrew from the Kattemeuterbos forest, they returned to their fortresses on the evening of September 13th, satisfied with their achievements despite the soaking rain. They immediately resumed surveillance tasks, which were crucial as the outermost soldiers frequently encountered Germans, leading to sporadic skirmishes. While these engagements were not strategically significant, they kept the Belgian soldiers perpetually vigilant, denying them proper rest. As Breton notes in his book, the Chasseurs remained resilient and motivated.

In France, General Joffre's persistent offensives against the Germans instilled a strong belief among the Belgian forces that their turn to drive the enemy back from the fortresses towards Germany was imminent. The Chasseurs held a steadfast conviction in the impregnability of the Antwerp fortresses, including Breendonk, where they were stationed. This confidence set the stage for their renewed engagement in battle ten days later. It is possible that during this period of heightened morale, the photograph in Figure 64.93 was taken, though the exact timing remains uncertain.

On September 24th, in response to French efforts to expel the Germans from the Reims and Roye regions, the Belgian armed forces were poised to exert additional pressure on the Germans in the north. The plan was to launch a large-scale offensive to push the Germans back behind the Zenne. However, intelligence reports of a significant impending German attack on the fortresses altered this strategy. The Chasseurs encountered no German resistance during their initial advance until they reached Willebroek. At this point, they had to hastily return to their defensive positions as a full-scale German assault on Antwerp commenced.

No further Belgian offensives could be mounted as the fortifications themselves came under relentless German attacks in the tragic days that followed. The siege of Antwerp by the Germans saw the Chasseurs fiercely defending the city, their resilience and determination a testament to their unyielding spirit in the face of overwhelming odds.

On September 28, 1914, the first German shells struck the Waelhem (Walem) and Sint Katelijne Waver fortresses near Antwerp. The German high command had determined that the stronghold around Antwerp needed to be neutralized, as it continually hindered their advance through Belgium. With the fall of Maubeuge, the Germans could position their heavy artillery, crafted by Krupp, within range of Antwerp. These formidable guns had already demolished the older fortresses of Liège and Namur, but the fortifications around Antwerp were modern and robust, defended by the entire Belgian army. Nevertheless, the sheer size and power of the German shells traumatized both soldiers and civilians with their deafening blasts and devastating impacts, which seemed designed to obliterate the entire Belgian defense. To the troops, it felt as if the devil himself had descended and unleashed hell.

The entire Belgian army, except for the 5th Division of the Chasseurs, manned the defensive lines[25]. Due to their elite status and mobility, the Chasseurs were kept in reserve, ready to be deployed where and when needed, akin to Napoleon's elite forces in the early 19th century. As the German threat intensified in the 3rd sector, the Chasseurs were sent there, where any further German success would have catastrophic consequences for the Belgians.

The battle raged for a week, day and night, with the 3rd sector repeatedly halting each German assault. The 5th Division of the Chasseurs was constantly called upon to reinforce every breach in the line. There was no rest, no time to eat, and the ground continually trembled under the ceaseless bombardment. The sound of collapsing buildings occasionally punctuated the deafening roar of artillery and gunfire. At times, when the Germans nearly overwhelmed the Chasseurs, they desperately called for reinforcements.

On October 4, the beleaguered Chasseurs were finally rescued after the main Belgian defense line had been breached. The British arrived to help, sending 3000 men to bolster the Chasseurs, providing much-needed relief.

On the following day, October 5, the combined efforts of the Chasseurs and the British prevented a German breakthrough at Ivy. However, they were unable to push the Germans back due to the enemy's overwhelming strength. The Germans had crossed the Nete River between Lier and Duffel, reaching a critical point that made the fall of Antwerp inevitable. To preserve hope for Antwerp and with the knowledge that more British reinforcements were coming, the Belgians needed to push the Germans back behind the Nete River at all costs.

In the afternoon of October 5, a counterattack was ordered. At noon, the 1st and 3rd Battalions of the 2nd Chasseurs were instructed to join other troops moving towards Pullaar, between Lint and Lier. The 2nd Battalion was already stationed at Emblem[26], northeast of Lier, occupying trenches on the west bank of the Nete River alongside the British marines. The 1st and 3rd Battalions were transported to the railway level at Herentals, crossing to reach Hulst. Suddenly, they were subjected to intense artillery fire, resulting in numerous casualties. Despite this, they continued their advance. By 2 p.m., the 1st Battalion had occupied trenches south of Hulst, while the 3rd Battalion remained in reserve, concealed in the forest just west of Hulst.

However, the German advance was relentless, supported by continuous heavy artillery. They moved from Duffel northward along the northern bank of the Nete River, capturing Lachenen[27], southwest of Hulst, and threatened to outflank the Chasseurs. In response, the 1st and 4th Companies of the 1st Battalion, led by Captains Tasnier and Tremont, launched an attack. Almost immediately, 40 Belgian soldiers were killed, but the attack succeeded in securing the outskirts of Lachenen by nightfall, forcing the Germans to retreat slightly.

Nevertheless, the success was incomplete; the Germans needed to be driven back across the river to secure a decisive victory.

During the night of October 5-6, under darkness, the Belgians launched a massive surprise attack between Duffel and Lier. The close-quarters battle required silent, deadly work with knives and bayonets, as gunfire was prohibited to maintain the element of surprise.

At 2 a.m. on October 6, Colonel Tiéchon, leading the 2nd Chasseurs, commanded the central attack column comprised of his regiment's 1st and 3rd battalions and the 2nd Carabineers. The order was clear and unwavering:

"One must conquer or die!"

The first target was the castle of Lachenen-Hof[28]. The Belgians formed three successive battalions in front of platoons, preceded by a screen of scouts. As they crossed the edge of a small forest, raucous cries of agony shattered the silence—the first Germans were being killed. This signaled the rest to lower their bayonets and rush forward.

Through a curtain of musketry and machine gun fire, the Belgians advanced, a figure carrying the Belgian flag at the center. The assault slowed as the Germans' heavy defense took its toll. Confusion ensued when someone shouted,

"It's the British, it's the British!"

For a moment, the Belgians hesitated, uncertain whether to cease fire or continue. But then the order rang out,

"No, it's the Germans, continue to attack!"

In the pitch darkness, such confusion was likely.

The ensuing battle was chaotic and brutal. Machine gun fire mowed down Belgian soldiers by the hundreds. Despite this, the attack continued, with soldiers using their bayonets, stumbling over the dead and wounded. The scene was horrific, driving some soldiers to madness amid the mutual slaughter. By dawn, corpses littered the battlefield. The Germans had yielded, except near Lier, where the Boomlaer forest provided a natural obstacle. As daylight broke, the Germans renewed their assault with heavy artillery, forcing the Belgian army to retreat again.

The order to pull back reached the 2nd Battalion of the 2nd Chasseurs, led by Major Leblanc, in the trenches of Emblem[29], where they had successfully resisted all German attacks. On October 6, it became painfully clear that the Krupp cannons had triumphed, and Antwerp was lost.

The tragic counterattack, in which the 2nd Chasseurs played a crucial role, marked one of the final defeats of the Belgian defense during World War I. This desperate and valiant effort symbolized the resilience and courage of the Belgian forces, even in the face of overwhelming odds.

64.7.1.6.6 Retreat to the Coast After the harrowing night of October 5-6, the scattered remnants of the Chasseurs managed to regroup at Boechout by the evening of October 6. These men had been without respite since September 26. Having narrowly escaped the clutches of hell, they found no solace as their orders directed them to the Schelde riverbanks they reached the following day. At the break of dawn on October 7, they crossed the bridge at Burcht[30], continuing their grueling march. After ten arduous hours, they arrived in Melsele near Beveren-Waas, utterly exhausted, with rifles in hand, collapsing into a fitful sleep. The early hours of Thursday, October 8, brought no relief. At 3 am, a state of emergency jolted the soldiers awake; they had to flee swiftly to evade encirclement by the relentless German advance. Every minute counted. The march became a near-'march of death.' After an excruciating 20-hour trek covering 50 kilometers without rest, the 2nd Chasseurs reached Assenede. The following day, they were crammed into train wagons at the station on October 9, bound for Torhout.

In Torhout, a semblance of respite awaited the troops. They could finally shower and enjoy proper meals. Yet, this brief sanctuary was fleeting. By Monday, October 12, they were retreating again, this time along roads teeming with fleeing civilians, reminiscent of the chaos depicted in Figure 64.95. Their next destination was Vladslo.

For Cyrille Lesage, this leg of the journey must have been laden with personal significance. His mother, Eudoxie Lammens, hailed from this region (Ichtegem - Koekelare - Vladslo). Though not a genealogist, Cyrille likely knew that Vladslo, shown in Figure 64.96, was the ancestral home of his mother's family. Perhaps he encountered relatives along the way or managed to communicate with his parents, Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens, who lived a mere 24 kilometers away. It is conceivable that he sent them a message urging them to flee to France. Indeed, Eudoxie, along with most of her children, did escape to France. At the same time, Emile and one son stayed behind to safeguard their farm and livestock[31]. Vladslo's proximity to Westrozebeke, Cyrille's birthplace, only 16 kilometers away, and Houthulst-Jonkershove, where Cyrille's younger brother Hector would be killed in September 1918, only 10 kilometers away, underscored the poignancy of this retreat[32].

As the Belgian forces retreated behind the Yser River, this last vestige of Belgian territory offered a slim hope of resisting the German onslaught. The strategic area south of the Yser was bolstered by wetlands and the river, with a floodplain capable of inundation with seawater if necessary.

In Vladslo, Breton's account describes how the soldiers finally found true rest amidst the serene countryside, even enjoying a beautiful autumn sunset. The fresh sea breeze rekindled their appetite. For Cyrille, being back in familiar territory must have stirred profound emotions. He was home, and the urge to reunite with friends and family, to recount his harrowing experiences and ensure their safety, must have been overwhelming.

On Tuesday, October 13, the soldiers received the crucial news: their retreat had ended. This was their final stand. From this point onward, they would dig in and prepare to fight to the death, defending the last remaining corner of Belgium. Here, they would form a defensive line alongside their allies, the French and the British, to halt the German advance. Vladslo, in particular, needed to be heavily fortified, serving as the first outpost to attempt to stop the Germans. Having lost much equipment in Antwerp, they had to scavenge for anything usable: rifles, cannons, vehicles, horses, food supplies, and communication lines.

The soldiers found encouragement in the news that they would no longer stand alone. The presence of the French and British on their flanks bolstered their morale. They also learned that His Majesty King Albert was safe and on their side of the line, vowing they would successfully halt the Germans from this point forward.

Due to the heavy casualties, it was decided on October 14 to merge the 2nd and 5th Chasseurs into a single regiment. These units had fought side by side, shedding blood together in the preceding weeks and battles. The group led by Reynaert also joined them, forming the 16th Mixed Brigade under the command of Colonel Sults.

This moment instilled a renewed sense of confidence in Cyrille Lesage.

The name Reynaert, shared by his great-grandmother Barbara Theresia Reynaert, born in Passchendaele in 1781, resonated deeply. Little did Cyrille know that Passchendaele would later become synonymous with one of the most horrific battles between the British and the Germans in the years to come.

The journey of the 2nd Chasseurs à Pied, from Mons at the beginning of the war to their arrival in Vladslo, is depicted in Figure 64.97.

In the context of our genealogical framework, it is essential to highlight that the group led by Colonel Sults was tasked with protecting the archives and the administration. On August 3, they transferred the documents to Kontich while the armed forces defended the Gette River.

Master quartermaster Radelet and his secretaries remained in Kontich to safeguard the archives until October 2, when they moved everything and everyone by train to Ostend, settling in the premises of the Volksbond. On October 12, they received orders to transport the documents by sea on the Langston steamer to Boulogne in France. After a two-day, two-night journey, they finally disembarked at Calais. From then on, the administration of Belgium operated from Calais. However, it is crucial to note that numerous archives were lost during the war, often falling victim to enemy fire or the ensuing military violence before they could be evacuated. This loss frustrates genealogists, who encounter gaps in their ancestral records due to these missing documents.

64.7.1.6.7 The Yser Battle The Belgian Army Reaches the Yser River

As the beleaguered Belgian Army reached the Yser River, their numbers had dwindled to a mere 80000 men, with only 48000 rifles at their disposal. Despite these dire circumstances, they were tasked with defending a 36 km front stretching from the coast to the French border at Boesinghe. Beyond this line, French soldiers continued the defense.

Between October 15 and October 18, the 5th Belgian Division held positions near the Ieperlee River, just south of Diksmuide. The 2nd Chasseurs executed a successful maneuver to Werken, then advanced to the northern edge of the Houthulst Forest. Unbeknownst to the soldiers, this area would later witness a climactic battle four years hence. By then, Cyrille Lesage would have perished, leaving his younger brother, Hector Lesage, and Zozyma Verhaeghe's brother, Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe, to fall in the final push for victory. Gerard Lesage, another brother of Cyrille, would survive the harrowing conflict. These individuals are portrayed in depth in Chapters 48.9.5.4 , 64.7.6, and 64.7.5.

Early Encounters and Strategic Movements

On October 15, the Belgian forces encountered British marines at Jonkershove, where Hector Lesage would meet his end four years later.

This meeting with the Marines lifted the spirits of the Belgian and French soldiers, who viewed it as a pivotal moment that would bolster their fighting capabilities. However, this newfound optimism would soon be shattered by the grim realities of trench warfare in the trenches of Diksmuide.

On the night of October 16, the first sighting of the German enemy occurred when an armed vehicle attacked Belgian soldiers of the 16th Brigade as they patrolled on bicycles. The 2nd Chasseurs were compelled to retreat to the Ieperlee River, where they established a bridgehead at Luigem. They spent the next two days fortifying their position, digging trenches in anticipation of imminent conflict, only to be redeployed before facing direct hostilities in that sector.

The Onset of the Battle

On Sunday, October 18, the 2nd Chasseurs, alongside the 5th Division, advanced northwards from Reninge towards Oostkerke, passing through Lampernisse and Loo. That day, the distant roar of gunfire and cannons from Keiem marked the onset of the Battle of the Yser. The Germans launched a fierce assault on Keiem that morning, meeting with tenacious Belgian resistance. Though Keiem fell to the Germans, the Belgians recaptured it the same day. Anticipating further large-scale German offensives, the Belgian high command remained on high alert.

On the morning of October 19, the 2nd Chasseurs received orders to proceed to the Stuivekenskerke region to support the beleaguered 11th Division. However, they were soon redirected to Kaaskerke to relieve Belgian soldiers trapped and under intense German attack. This began a relentless and bloody struggle defining the Yser front, with soldiers like Cyrille Lesage caught in the vortex of one of the Great War's most brutal theaters.

Flank Attacks and Retreats

The strategic plan was to organize a flank attack on the advancing German forces targeting Keiem and Beerst. This operation commenced from Diksmuide and was executed in coordination with the British marines. The Belgian troops successfully crossed the Yser, advancing via Dixmuide to Esen, while other battalions launched concurrent assaults.

Despite the initial success, the arrival of substantial German reinforcements from Roeselare necessitated a tactical retreat. The Belgians and British marines were forced to withdraw behind the Yser, fortifying the left bank. By midnight, the 2nd Chasseurs had retreated to Lampernisse. During this retreat, they witnessed the inferno at Vladslo.

This sight must have been particularly distressing for Cyrille, knowing his mother, Eudoxie Lammens, had ancestral roots and living relatives there.

The Horrors of Trench Warfare

On October 20, the 2nd Chasseurs repositioned at Oostkerke station, designated as a reserve force to bolster any weakened points along the front. That same day, at 2 pm, they were dispatched to defend the region of Sint-Jacobs-Kapelle under the command of Major Delbauve, aiming to counter the German offensive on Diksmuide bolstered by reinforcements from Roeselare.

From this point, the two battalions of the 2nd Chasseurs diverged. The 1st Battalion engaged in combat at Sint-Jacobs-Kapelle and Pervijze, while the 2nd Battalion focused on defending Diksmuide. In response to the escalating threat, the Belgians initiated a deliberate inundation of the area from October 21 onwards, as shown in Figure 64.98.

The Intensity of the Battle and the Relentless Struggle

On October 21, the 1st Battalion entrenched near Nieuwkapelle, tasked with defending a 400-meter front along the Sint-Jacobs-Kapelle to Woumen line. That night, amidst the persistent threat, soldiers found a brief respite, frying fish knocked out by bomb blasts in the river. However, this fleeting relief was shattered on October 22, when the Germans, recognizing the futility of capturing Diksmuide and Nieuwpoort, redirected their efforts towards breaching the Belgian defenses at Tervate.

The German offensive commenced at 7:30 am on October 24, targeting Stuivekenskerke. The village soon became a blazing battleground, with Belgian soldiers falling in droves. As the front line became untenable, the Belgians retreated behind the railway, shielded by the 4th company. They held these trenches on October 25 and 26, enduring relentless German bombardments. The soldiers, entrenched in mud and constant fear, faced the omnipresent threat of death from the German machine guns a mere 500 meters away. For a week, they endured these dire conditions with scant food, contaminated water, and unrelenting enemy fire. The village of Pervijze was obliterated under continuous German bombardment, reducing it to rubble.

Counterattacks and Exhaustion

On the morning of October 27, following another night repelling German attacks, the 1st Battalion moved south of Pervijze along the railway bed to make way for arriving French reinforcements. By evening, the Belgians received orders to defend the Pervijze station and crossing at all costs. The 1st Battalion, exhausted and battle-worn during this intense occupation, was finally relieved on October 28, allowing them a much-needed respite from the brutal frontlines.

These detailed accounts of the Yser Battle reveal the tactical maneuvers, the intense combat scenarios, and the personal toll on soldiers like Cyrille Lesage, encapsulating both the strategic and human elements of this significant WWI confrontation.

The Story of the 2nd and 3rd Battalions

On the morning of October 20, the German forces unleashed a massive bombardment on Diksmuide. After several unsuccessful attempts, they commenced a determined advance at 3 pm. The ensuing struggle was fierce, necessitating the deployment of the 11th Division, previously held in reserve, in a desperate bid to halt the German onslaught.

Meanwhile, the battalions of the 12th Division, which had been entrenched on the front lines since the previous day, were in dire need of relief. The 11th Division, fully committed to repelling the German advance, had no reserves for this task. Consequently, the 5th Division's reserves, specifically the 2nd Chasseurs, received urgent orders on the night of October 20-21. While the 1st Battalion of the 2nd Chasseurs had already moved to Nieuwkapelle, the 2nd and 3rd Battalions were now tasked with the critical mission of holding the line.

The Chasseurs Hold the Line

On October 21, the soldiers of the 2nd and 3rd Battalions took up their positions. In small groups, they traversed perilous ground, often exposed to direct German rifle fire. Some had to cross Diksmuide's main square to reach their designated positions. The 3rd Battalion's companies departed from the 'Grand Cambron' farm, moving along an elevated road toward the Diksmuide cemetery. As daylight broke, the remaining companies followed.

By 11 am, the intensity of the bombardments increased. Advancing soldiers frequently dove into ditches or hit the ground to avoid nearby explosions. Despite the barrage, they managed to cross the bridge. By noon, the 2nd Chasseurs had successfully reached and fortified their positions in the southern sector of the bridgehead. The 3rd Battalion entrenched themselves from the cemetery to the Esen road. A company of British marines was positioned between the 1st and 4th Companies of the 2nd Chasseurs. Two reserve companies remained in Diksmuide, stationed at the train station and the inn 'In 't Tafelrond.' The 2nd Chasseurs' command post was established 300 meters south of Diksmuide's Main Square at a strategic crossroads. Additional units were positioned north of Diksmuide at Keizershoek.

Navigating through the Main Square, the Chasseurs had to maneuver around craters created by German artillery. Upon reaching the Beerst road, a massive explosion rocked the area as a shell struck Diksmuide's city hall. The impact collapsed much of the building, trapping members of the 16th Mixed Brigade inside. One room, although heavily damaged, allowed the men to survive. However, their escape route led them to an adjacent room, destroyed, with around 50 men either killed or grievously wounded. The horrific scene is vividly recounted in Breton's detailed chronicles.

Holding the Line at Diksmuide

The situation in the southeast of Diksmuide was equally dire. The Chasseurs occupied trenches between the Esen and Woumen roads, with orders to hold these positions at all costs amid relentless bombardment.

In the early afternoon of October 21, German infantry advanced from Esen, engaging the 2nd Chasseurs. The Belgian defenders, known for their marksmanship, utilized machine guns to maintain control over the road, successfully repelling the German assault after inflicting heavy casualties.

Despite halting the infantry advance, the Germans maintained their artillery barrage, particularly devastating the area near the cemetery. The constant shelling signaled the likelihood of another imminent assault.

During these bombardments, neither the Chasseurs nor the British marines, interspersed among them, could return fire. They were forced to remain prone in the muddy trenches, enduring the harrowing ordeal and hoping to survive the continuous onslaught.

The Horror Continues

The Germans intensified their bombardment on the cemetery area, expanding their assault northward to reach full force by 11 pm. The Chasseurs, although outnumbered three to one, steadfastly held their positions. The Germans launched luminous flares intermittently, illuminating the devastated landscape before the Belgians. The 2nd Chasseurs fired so relentlessly that their rifles became scorching hot, causing burns, and some rifles malfunctioned due to the heat. In such cases, they took up fallen comrades' weapons to continue fighting. Their primary need became a steady supply of cartridges, each soldier firing an average of 400 rounds—equivalent to seven boxes of ammunition—throughout the night.

Periodically, the German soldiers would shout "Hoch!" and charge towards the Belgian trenches, leading to brutal hand-to-hand combat with bayonets. The situation remained precarious throughout the night. Fortunately, French marines arrived to bolster the Belgian defense, and together they launched a counterattack against the Germans.

Aftermath of the Battle

As dawn broke, the devastation of the previous night became visible. Soldiers were drenched in blood and mud, their uniforms torn, and trenches shattered. Amid the wreckage, Belgian, French, and German soldiers gathered every usable weapon, many still fitted with bayonets, some broken, others stained with blood. The Chasseurs discovered numerous corpses both in front and behind their lines, evidence of the Germans breaking through at times during the night. Wounded soldiers, including 49 Germans, were evacuated to medical units south of Diksmuide. However, German snipers targeted those attempting to rescue the wounded, which the Belgians viewed as a cowardly act.

The continuous German machine-gun fire forced the Belgians to repair their trenches under duress and continue evacuating the wounded. Most were taken to the Saint John Hospital, a tall building marked with a Red Cross, clearly visible. Breton recounts a German soldier, fearful and wounded, nearly hit by a shell from his side, crying out, as he believed the hospital was targeted and begged to be moved elsewhere.

"Nicht hier! Nicht hier! Boom! Alles kaput,"

The Chasseurs' Suffering

The 2nd Chasseurs, still entrenched south of Diksmuide, faced continuous German gunfire and the constant threat of an assault. They scavenged the battlefield for rifles and ammunition, acquiring two machine guns and 150 rifles, along with helmets and cartridges.

Amidst the battle, the 2nd Chasseurs also endured hunger and thirst. Young men like Cyrille Lesage, accustomed to the hearty meals of farm life, found sustenance scarce as the priority was ammunition, not food. They joked about their hunger and dreams of what they wished to eat. Occasionally, they ventured into partially demolished houses searching for provisions, finding salted pork in a nearby farmhouse cellar. As in many wars, plundering became a grim necessity for survival.

Desperation and Relief

On the night of October 22, anticipating further nocturnal attacks, the 2nd Chasseurs set fire to piles of straw in the surrounding fields, creating enough light to detect any approaching enemy forces. Throughout the night, they witnessed the ongoing destruction of Diksmuide, with home after home succumbing to flames. The once grand Town Hall and beautiful church were reduced to ruins, and despite the precautions, the night remained relatively quiet.

On the morning of October 23, the Germans resumed their shelling of the 2nd Chasseurs. New casualties occurred, and previously buried bodies were unearthed by the fresh bombardments. The shelling persisted until evening, subjecting the soldiers to 60 hours of relentless fire in the trenches. Finally, on the evening of October 23, the Meiser Brigade arrived to relieve the beleaguered 2nd Chasseurs. Late that night, the surviving Chasseurs reached Oostkerke, exhausted but alive.

A Brief Respite

There, they were reunited with their comrades who had been relieved from the Keizershoek sector that same evening. They were granted 48 hours of rest and recovery, which, as history would show, was a fleeting hope. The horrors of war seldom granted such luxuries, and the next day, they were thrust back into the vortex of conflict for another grueling three days.

At Oostkerke, in the early hours of Saturday, October 24, 1914, a novel cannonade began and raged with relentless ferocity north of Diksmuide.

As the 2nd Chasseurs were still in the process of recovery and equipment restoration, an ominous rumor spread through the ranks: the Germans had succeeded in crossing the Yser River at Diksmuide, and the beleaguered Belgian forces were struggling to halt their advance. This rumor, far from baseless, held a grim truth. The Germans, leveraging their overwhelming firepower and strategic positioning, were exerting immense pressure on the Belgian defenses beyond Tervate. Under the cover of a devastating storm of artillery fire, they pushed inexorably towards the railroad, threatening to sever critical supply lines and outflank the Allied positions. The Belgian Army, though brave, found itself outnumbered and outgunned. The German forces, employing innovative military tactics and superior logistical support, demonstrated their capability to orchestrate a coordinated assault that combined infantry, artillery, and pioneering use of machine guns. The Battle of the Yser thus became a testament to the fierce resistance of the Belgian soldiers, who, despite facing impossible odds, managed to hold the line and prevent a complete German breakthrough. Their efforts would symbolize national resilience and a critical juncture in the broader context of the Great War, influencing subsequent military strategies and engagements.

Like many of his compatriots, Cyrille Lesage bore witness to the sheer brutality and chaos of this confrontation. The exhaustion etched on the faces of his fellow soldiers, the deafening roar of the cannonade, and the ever-present specter of death became the defining elements of their existence. The Yser, a once serene river, now stood as a bloody testament to the sacrifices made for freedom and sovereignty.

Renewed Struggle

The Yser River represented the last line of defense for the beleaguered Belgian forces during the Great War. Recognizing the strategic importance of holding this line, the Belgian command committed every available man to halt the advancing German forces. Among these reinforcements were the 2nd Chasseurs, who were redeployed to the front lines to support the counterattack efforts. On the morning of October 24, the 2nd and 3rd battalions of the 2nd Chasseurs were dispatched to Oud-Stuivekenskerke, a key position due to its large church tower, which served as a critical observation post.

From Oud-Stuivekenskerke, the Belgians aimed to launch an offensive against German positions at the farms Den Toren and Vandewoude, located on the left bank of the Yser. These farms had been pivotal support points for German attacks. The Chasseurs' right flank was bolstered by 1st-line troops and French or British Marines, and the assault was also supported by Belgian artillery.

The Chasseurs Push Forward

The 2nd Chasseurs were driven by a mixture of duty and defiance, believing their sudden reappearance would catch the Germans off guard. Breton captures the sentiment of the troops through the words of one soldier:

"They think they have killed us; well, now they will have to kill us a second time!"

Their advance was initially unopposed as they reached the crossroads at Lettenberg Cabaret, where the road from Diksmuide to Pervijze intersected with the path to Oostkerke. However, as they moved forward, they came under heavy artillery fire from German positions west of Beerst. The Germans' strategic placement of heavy cannons allowed them to bombard the Belgian-held territory near the railway, turning the area into a deadly gauntlet for the advancing Chasseurs.

A Desperate Advance

Scouts led the way, followed by the main force. Despite facing continuous skirmishes and artillery barrages, the 2nd Chasseurs pressed on. The terrain was unforgiving, and the troops were forced to move erratically under the relentless shellfire and machine-gun bursts. Breton describes the scene vividly, noting how each soldier sought cover wherever possible, sometimes crawling through ditches or taking shots from behind scant cover.

Casualties were high, with soldiers falling by the dozens. Direct hits from German shells occasionally obliterated entire squads. Yet, despite the chaos and carnage, the Chasseurs continued their advance, driven by training, resilience, and sheer determination.

The Capture of Oud-Stuivekenskerke

By 11 am, the 2nd Chasseurs had reached the western edge of Oud-Stuivekenskerke. Supported on their right flank by Marines, they began clearing the village of German forces. Despite fierce resistance, the Germans eventually retreated, leaving the church tower inexplicably untouched and locked. The cost of recapturing the village was steep, with the Belgians suffering 300 casualties among the regular troops and losing 13 officers.

Pushing Towards the Farm

The German strategy soon became apparent. After abandoning the village, they subjected it to intense artillery bombardment, reducing Oud-Stuivekenskerke to ruins, with only a sliver of the once-massive church tower remaining. Undeterred, the Belgians, now reinforced by French troops, pressed on towards the farm Vanderwoude. Under heavy gunfire and supported by their artillery, they crossed the small river or creek Vliet, advancing through the mud.

Exhaust and despair set in as they approached within 600 meters of the farm. The relentless days of combat had drained their strength, and they found themselves mired in mud, struggling to advance. Despite their physical and emotional fatigue, the 2nd Chasseurs had successfully pushed the Germans back to the banks of the Yser.

A Crucial Position

Having penetrated deeply into German-held territory, the 2nd Chasseurs faced urgent logistical challenges. Establishing command from a small farm north of Oud-Stuivekenskerke, east of the Vliet creek, they found themselves precariously positioned. The only supply route, a bridge, was constantly threatened by German scouts positioned a mere 350 meters away. The high vulnerability of this supply line forced the Belgians to ration their ammunition.

As night fell, the soldiers of the 2nd Chasseurs were forced to endure the harsh conditions in their trenches, with water up to their knees, suffering from fever, hunger, and exhaustion. The battle at the Yser had tested their limits, yet their efforts had been crucial in holding the line against the German onslaught.

The Encirclement

Diksmuide, in Figure 64.100, was a smoldering inferno on their right, its silhouette marred by the flames that consumed it. The little town of Kaaskerke burned lugubriously, with the towering spire of its church standing like a solitary torch above the humble homes engulfed by fire. Closer still, the Yser River carried torrents of black smoke from the fiery petrol released by the tanks at 'Pillar 16.' This thick, acrid fume snaked toward the Vliet creek, casting an ominous pall over the landscape.

Behind the beleaguered Chasseurs, a similar current of dense smoke moved slowly, illuminated intermittently by the flames that devoured Oud-Stuyvekenskerke. To their left, Stuyvekenskerke and Pervyse writhed in agony, trapped in flames that completed a colossal circle of fire and death. This infernal ring burst with misery, encircling the heroic battalions and transforming the night into a tableau of horror.

The strategic significance of the Yser Front in World War I cannot be overstated. It was a battleground where the Belgian Army faced relentless German offensives alongside French and British forces. The Allies aimed to halt the German advance through Belgium and prevent them from gaining control of key ports along the English Channel. The Battle of the Yser fought between October 16 and October 31, 1914, was crucial in establishing the Western Front's trench warfare, which would define much of the conflict.

Hopelessness and Stubborn Defence

On the morning of Sunday, October 25, the soldiers were gripped by hopelessness. Supplies had dwindled to nothing; there was neither food nor drink. The Germans, equally exhausted, ceased their relentless attacks, resorting instead to sporadic shelling of the Belgians' supply routes. The 2nd Chasseurs stoically held their ground, realizing that any movement would spell certain death. Silence reigned among them; they spoke only in whispers. When a comrade fell, they murmured,

"No more suffering for him."

The grim reality of war was laid bare in the makeshift infirmary housed in a dilapidated barn. Here, the wounded were gathered, awaiting an evacuation that seemed impossible. Nurses, doctors, and chaplains moved among them, offering what solace they could. Those who were feverish and ill were provided with heated water boiled over a small fire to make it potable. The rain that fell that evening relieved those outside, softening the edges of their suffering.

Their unyielding defense exemplified the heroism of the Belgian soldiers against overwhelming odds. Despite being outnumbered and outgunned, they managed to hold the line, inspired by the leadership of figures like King Albert I, who took personal command of his troops. The Belgian strategy of flooding the Yser Plain, a desperate measure to halt the German advance, played a pivotal role in their defense, creating a natural barrier that impeded the enemy's progress.

The Major's Fate and Continued Struggle

In his memoirs, Breton vividly recounts the fate of the heroic Majors and Captains, though he often overlooks the ordinary soldiers. As we have mentioned Major Delbauve earlier in this chapter, we report his demise with a heavy heart. News arrived that he had been killed the day before at Pervijze, alongside almost his entire unit. In Pervijze, many soldiers from the other two battalions remained in the trenches, enduring yet another night of torrential rain, without food or water, and submerged in icy water.

The dawn of October 26 revealed new German preparations at the ruined farms of Den Toren and Vandewoude, sending waves of panic through the Belgian ranks. The thought of being subjected to another barrage of German shells from these positions was terrifying. Yet, the officers managed to maintain discipline, compelling the soldiers to stay in their trenches. In response, Belgian artillery sprang into action, targeting and demolishing these farmhouses to prevent the Germans from using them as launching points for further attacks.

The Battle of the Yser was a testament to the resilience and determination of the Belgian Army. Despite facing superior German forces, the Belgians held their ground, aided by the strategic use of the Yser River and the flooded plains. The successful defense of the Yser Front marked a significant turning point in the early stages of World War I, preventing the Germans from breaking through to the French Channel ports and altering the course of the war.

The legacy of the Battle of the Yser and the bravery of soldiers like Cyrille Lesage endure as poignant reminders of the sacrifices made during World War I. Their steadfastness in the face of overwhelming adversity is a testament to the human spirit's capacity for courage and resilience.

Restoring Hope

A relentless barrage of gunfire marked the Belgian offensive. The Chasseurs sometimes expended their last cartridges, driven by the urgent need to eradicate the German outpost. Resupplies were anticipated later that day, but until then, every shot counted. The Belgians transformed the attic of a small farm into an observation post despite the scary environment where bullets seemed omnipresent. From this vantage point, they could observe the beleaguered Germans, similarly entrenched near their farms, subjected to the precise bombardments of the Belgian artillery.

As the German resistance waned, the 2nd Chasseurs seized the opportunity to advance toward Oostkerke once the rain ceased on October 26. The procession that ensued was a harrowing sight—a column of exhausted and wounded men, their uniforms tattered and muddied, traversing the desolate landscape scarred by shellfire. The wounded were either carried or struggled to walk, while the dead were borne alongside on improvised stretchers fashioned from doors, shutters, and planks salvaged from shattered homes. Some Chasseurs, driven to the brink of madness by the horrors they had witnessed, seemed scarcely aware of their surroundings or their destination.

Regrouping and Reforming

From Oostkerke, the remnants of the two battalions moved to Alveringhem, finally out of the deadly zone, to recuperate and regroup. On the morning of October 29, they were joined by the survivors of the Delbauve battalion, who had escaped the inferno of Pervyse. A new regiment was formed out of the shattered remnants to continue the fight.

At the outset of their journey from Mons, the 2nd and 5th Chasseurs comprised 57 officers and 4500 soldiers. Three grueling months later, at the end of the Yser battle, a mere 19 officers and just over 2000 men remained combat-ready, a stark testament to the ferocity of the conflict.

Winter of 1914 and Beyond

The historian Breton recounts another notable engagement of the 2nd Chasseurs during the Yser campaign in the winter of 1914. On December 20, they were tasked with establishing a bridgehead on the German side of the Yser, south of Diksmuide. The operation was carried out under darkness, showcasing the Chasseurs' determination and strategic insight.

Throughout the winter, the Belgian Army seized the opportunity to reorganize and fortify the last stretch of unoccupied Belgian territory behind the Yser River, transforming it into a bastion of resistance.

Aftermath

Breton's report concludes here, yet the war raged on until the autumn of 1918, culminating in Germany's defeat. Between January 1915 and Cyrille Lesage's death on March 18, 1916, the 2nd Chasseurs continued their relentless struggle.

In early March 1915, King Albert of Belgium visited the troops and delivered a rousing speech at Alveringhem in the presence of the 2nd Chasseurs. By April 15, 1915, the Chasseurs were stationed west of Lovaart, near Lo-Reninge.

April 22 witnessed the first German gas attack at Steenstrate, situated between Lo-Reninge and Ypres, a grim milestone in the annals of warfare. On May 9, the Belgians captured a bridgehead, with the 2nd Chasseurs tasked with defending the positions vacated by the advancing forces. The following day, they repelled a massive German assault and captured a house within the German-held bridgehead on the opposite side of the Yser. Another fierce German attack ensued on May 11.

As spring turned to summer, the battlefield became a breeding ground for flies and mosquitoes, the air thick with the stench of decomposing bodies, a haunting reminder of the ceaseless carnage.

64.7.1.7 His Death in Paris and Burial at Père Lachaise in Paris

On August 12, 1915, the Germans launched a gas attack on the Belgians at Noordschote, situated just southeast of Lo (Lo-Reninge). Subsequently, on August 21, 1915, Cyrille was evacuated from the front due to an illness resulting from the gas attack. It is unclear whether he had the opportunity to see his mother or family after his evacuation, as they were residing in northern France during the war.

However, it is known that he died in Paris in March 1916. The relevant certificates are displayed in Figures 64.101 and 64.102. He succumbed to lung tuberculosis, a condition exacerbated by the damage to his respiratory system caused by the gas attack.

Cyrille is interred near his distant cousin, René Charles François Cotteau de Patin. The register entry for René is illustrated in Figure 70.115 on page 1505 and further discussed in Chapter 70.8.1.2.2.

64.7.1.8 Other Memorials Honoring Cyrille Lesage

The other memorials can be found in Ledegem in Belgium, where the Lesage-Lammens family lived when WWI began, and are shown in Figure 64.105.

64.7.1.9 The Medals of Cyrille Lesage

His military records reveal that he received the Yser Medal,[33] a Knight Cross of the order of Leopold II and the War Cross (Croix de Guerre).[34]

He also received two front chevrons. The medals are shown in Figure 64.106.

64.7.2 Alida Lesage

In Figure 64.111, Alida was born as the second child of Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens. Her elder brother was Cyrille Lesage. Unfortunately, Alida lived for merely one month.

After her death, in Figure 64.112, ten more registered children would be born, the first being Martha.

Martha Lesage

Martha Lesage is geboren. op 9 maart 1893. Zij was de echtgenote van Edouard Buyse en moeder van drie zonen.

Martha heeft zeker geen gemakkelijk leven gehad. Op 19 juni 1938 reeds verloor zij haar man. Op dat ogenblik, zo kort voor de Tweede Wereldoorlog, stond zij alleen voor de zorg over haar hoeve en over haar drie onmondige kinderen. De oudste van de drie was pas 10 jaar, de jongste vijf.

Zij was echter een harde, sterke vrouw, de oudste uit een groot landbouwersgezin, en al die jaren is zij erin geslaagd de zaken te laten draaien zoals het hoorde.

Indertijd woonde zij met haar gezin in de omgeving van de Vossemolen. Later is zij bij haar zoon André gaan inwonen. Zij is er 14 jaar gebleven. Toen daar verbouwingen uitgevoerd werden, verhuisde zij naar één van haar andere zonen om een jaar later uiteindelijk binnen te gaan in het rusthuis St.-Henricus te Rumbeke.

Dat is nu ondertussen al 14 jaar geleden. Lange tijd mocht Martha genieten van een sterke gezondheid, maar met Sinksen 1982 werd zij getroffen door een hartinfarkt. Toen op 11 november daar nog een trombose bijkwam, was dit uiteraard het begin van het einde.

Op 13 januari is zij dan stilletjes overleden. Zij werd dinsdag ter aarde gedragen, na een plechtige eucharistieviering te 10 u.30 in de parochiale kerk van St.-Petrus en Paulus te Rumbeke.

Doorheen onze betraande ogen, bij het verlies van een goede vader, zijn we de Heer dankbaar dat we papa zolang samen met mama in ons midden hadden. Nu wij hem moeten missen, beseffen we wat hij voor ons heeft betekend. Zijn leven lang heeft hij gewerkt voor zijn gezin. Er was vreugde, er was leed, maar steeds was hij met mama in trouwe liefde reeds 66 jaar samen. Eenvoud kenmerkte zijn leven, uiterlijke praal was hem vreemd maar in eenvoudige alledaagse dingen vond hij vreugde. Eens op rust, nam hij samen, met mama, deel aan de activiteiten van de Okra en de Landelijke Gilde, doch bleef ook altijd bereid om nog een handje toe te steken op de hoeve in de Boskantstraat. Het was een schone en vreugdevolle tijd. Een drietal jaar terug, werd papa afhankelijk van mama, die hem gedurende die tijd dag en nacht ter zijde stond. Toen mama verleden jaar ook hulpbehoevend werd, was dit voor jou zeer zwaar om dragen. Je enige wens was om samen te zijn voor de tijd die jullie nog restte. Een opname in het rusthuis was onvermijdelijk, waar jullie terug samen konden zijn. Jammer genoeg heeft dit maar enkele maanden mogen duren...

Dierbare echtgenote, met Gods genade en in groeiende liefde hebben we samen een mooi gezin en een echte thuis mogen opbouwen. Dank voor de grote liefde en de goede zorgen die u aan mij hebt besteed. Over de grenzen van de dood heen, blijven we met elkaar verbonden.

Dierbare kinderen, klein- en achterkleinkinderen, voor u heb ik gewerkt en geleefd. Uw zorg en vreugde was ook de mijne. Blijf een steun voor uw goede moeder en voor elkaar. Vaarwel.

Beste familie, buren en vrienden, dank voor alles wat u voor mij hebt gedaan en de talrijke bezoekjes.

Een mens is als de grond : in de mate dat hij 'bewerkt' wordt, wordt hij vruchtbaar. Hij is als de planten en de bomen : hij wordt gezaaid, geplant, verzorgd en groeit en bloeit, tot hij verwelkt en sterven moet... Maar er is een groot verschil : een mens is in elk proces van zijn bestaan in Gods handen. Hij die hem schiep, brengt hem ook tot voltooiing. De mens die in geloof naar God toe leeft, vergaat niet, maar keert terug bij God, waar hij een ander leven leidt.

Zo is Paul op de wereld gekomen en uitgegroeid tot een schoon en edel mens, een gelovig man die, alhoewel alleen gebleven, toch veel vruchten heeft voortgebracht. Als boerenzoon was hij verknocht aan velden en natuur, vergroeid met planten en dieren. Hij leefde mee op het ritme der seizoenen, die wisselend komen en gaan.

Hij werkte van jongsaf 'te boere', werd zelfs een tijdje fabrieksarbeider, maar keerde terug naar zijn 'eerste liefde' : het landelijk leven en zijn lievelingsdier het paard. Paarden zijn mooie beesten : beeld van taaie werkkracht en sierlijke beweging, hardnekkig en vurig. Hij werkte zich op tot controleur van de ponyveulens over de provincie. Wie van dieren houdt, houdt van mensen. Sociaal voelend als hij was, maakte hij vele vrienden. Hij was aktief lid van de Landelijke gilde te Izegem en werd commandant van de Izegemse ponyruiters. Het werd zijn levenswerk en maakte er zich dienstbaar en geliefd. Zelfs de laatste weken van zijn ziekte konden hem niet weerhouden, dank zij de goede vrienden, nog tweemaal hun kamp te bezoeken. De band met de ruiterij verstevigde de band met medemensen.

Hij zal in eeuwigheid nooit vergeten die vele attenties van zijn eigenaar en van de broers en zusters en van de vele vrienden, die vooral in zijn ziekte begaan waren met zijn welzijn en zijn dagen trachtten aangenaam te maken. De was, voedsel, verzorging en gezelschap waren hun dagelijkse bekommernis.

De huifkar, waarmee hij met een jeugdclub eertijds een tocht maakte, geeft hem nu op zijn laatste dag een stille geborgenheid, een diepe vrede en een witte blijdschap.

Hij die zo dikwijls Gods zorg en goedheid mocht ondervinden in de goede zorgen van medemensen, wordt nu bij de Vader ontvangen, om al het schone en het goede van zijn leven in Gods handen neer te leggen. Hij moge er nu rusten in vrede voor eeuwig.

64.7.3 Martha Lesage

64.7.3.1 Introduction

Images of Martha Lesage are shown in Figure 64.113.

64.7.3.2 Her Birth and Youth

Martha Helena Lesage (Westrozebeke, March 9, 1893 - Roeselare, January 13, 1983) was the 3d child of Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens. Her birth is shown in Figure 64.114. Still, since her elder sister had died after one month, she was born with only one sibling, namely her elder brother Cyrille, three years older.

Later, Martha would have many more brothers and sisters, namely Amandine, Gerard, Hector, Maria, Paul, Godelieve, Irma, Oscar, and Daniel. The family initially lived in Westrozebeke but moved to Moorslede before 1898, near the train station in Satiestraat 518.

In July 1912, the family moved to Ledegem to a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. Everything went well until WWI started in the summer of 1914. During the invasion of Belgium by the Germans, Martha, with her mother Eudoxie and most of her siblings, fled to Oudezeele in the North of France, close to the Belgian border. Emile Lesage stayed at the farm in Ledegem with Paul while Cyrille was in the military. Later, the other sons, Gerard and Hector, would also join the military.

Martha lived with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, the road from the village center to Café des Trois Rois, located near the village center. The home was designated number 49 on the list of homes of refugees at Oudezeele during WWI. The family consisted of 2 adults, namely Martha and her mother Eudoxie, and the other siblings except Cyrille and Paul.

On September 30, 1921, the family changed significantly, shifting its official address from Ledegem to Beselare, Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, at the junction with Slangemeersstraat. This move marked a new chapter in Martha's life as she transitioned from her early years in Ledegem to a new home in Beselare.

Martha appears on the census of Beselare of 1920-1930, for Keiberg - Spilstraat 12, but not in the consecutive census of 1930-1940. Indeed, she must have married by then and lived somewhere else with her husband and family.

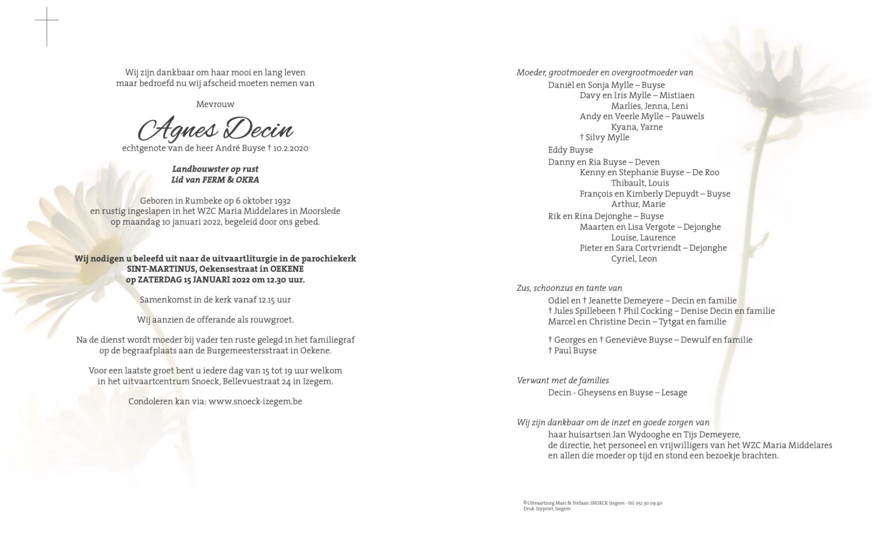
64.7.3.3 Her Death

Her mortuary card and a newspaper article when she died are shown in Figures 64.115 and 64.116.

64.7.3.4 Her Descendants

Martha Lesage had three children. They are shown in Figures 64.117, 64.118 and 64.119. The author was deeply moved by the comforting words sent by André Buyse after the loss of his father, Maurice Declercq (DC16), in 2015.

Lisa Dejonghe, a granddaughter of André, has a wonderful and captivating family and is still in contact with the author. It's a poignant reminder of the enduring nature of our connections to imagine how Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens would have felt,



Wij zijn dankbaar om haar mooi en lang leven

BID GOD VOOR DE ZIEL VAN

Heer Jules-Alberic DEBUF

Echtgenoot van Mevrouw Amandine LESAGE

geboren te Moorslede de 8 november 1897 en godvruchtig overleden te Bikschote, de 16 december 1963, gesterkt door de laatste Heilige Sakramenten en de Pauselijke Zegen.

Oudstrijder-Vuurkruiser 1914-18.

Het afsterven van een trouwe echtgenoot en goede vader raakt steeds diep het hart van zijn geliefden. Want met hem verdwijnt een stuk levensgeluk dat niet meer weerkeert.

Maar de troost die Jezus gaf aan Martha, geeft Hij ook aan ons : « Ik ben de Verrijzenis en het Leven : wie in Mij gelooft zal leven, ook al is hij gestorven. »

De dierbare overledene was een diep-gelovig man, uit Gods hand aanvaardde hij wel en wee, gelijkvormig aan Zijn Wil en betrouwend op Zijn Voorzienigheid.

Werkzaam en naarstig, eerlijk in handel en wandel ; diep-kristelijk overtuigd voor recht en eer ging hij recht door het leven ; vriendelijk en dienstvaardig van karakter wist hij de genegenheid te winnen van allen die met hem in betrekking kwamen. Voor zijn gezin was hij vol ijver en zorg, bestendig bekommerd, niet alleen om de stoffelijke vooruitgang maar ook om de kristelijke levensrichting.

BEMINDE ECHTGENOTE, samen hebben wij in trouwe liefde geleefd ; heb dank voor de steun en de zorg die gij waart in mijn leven. Onze scheiding is slechts tijdelijk. Bij de Heer spreek ik voor u ten beste.

GELIEFDE KINDEREN EN KLEINKINDEREN, gij waart mijn vreugde en mijn trots. Uw verdriet om vaders heengaan is groot, omdat zijn liefde voor u groot was. God zegene en beware u. In dankbare kinderlijke liefde om alles wat ik voor u deed, zult gij dagelijks voor mijn zielerust bidden. Omringt moeder met tedere zorg en sterke steun.

BEMINDE BROEDERS, ZUSTERS EN FAMILIELEDEN, vaartwel en gedenkt mij in uw godvruchtige gebeden, vooral gij mijn Eerwaarde Tante, die u aan de Heer hebt gewijd.

Akten van Geloof, Hoop en Liefde.

In haar 88e levensjaar overleed in de vrede van de Heer, om eeuwig bij Hem te leven :

Mevrouw

Amandine LESAGE

weduwe van de Heer Jules DE BUF.

Zij werd geboren te Westrozebeke op 5 september 1895 en is tot de Heer teruggekeerd te Ieper op 28 november 1983, voorbereid en gesterkt door de sakramenten van de zieken.

Zij was lid van al de Broederschappen van de parochie en van de bond van de derde leeftijd.

,, Stel uw vertrouwen op de Heer, Hij zal voor U zorgen ! ''

Haar leven lang heeft Amandine haar vertrouwen gesteld op God, haar Schepper, en haar Meester ; Hij had de eerste plaats in haar leven, zonder veel omhaal maar daadwerkelijk en zonder menselijk opzicht ; zij droeg de diepe godsdienstzin mede uit haar ouderlijk huis, beleefde en beleed hem haar leven door en plantte hem over op haar naastbestaanden en op allen met wie zij in betrekking kwam. Hoe graag vertelde zij niet over haar zorg voor de familie bij wie zij gevlucht was gedurende de 1e oorlog ; over de kinderen die zij leerde lopen en bidden, die zij meenam naar de kerk ; hoe fier was zij niet toen een ervan priester werd gewijd.

Amandine was een in-goede moeder, haar rusteloos werken en kommervol zorgen hadden slechts een doel : het levensgeluk van haar kinderen en kleinkinderen, hun welvaren was haar grootste vreugde ; toen ze naar Bikschote kwam, 24 jaar geleden, was het niet om te rusten, maar gebruikte zij haar tijd om het huishouden te beredderen, met naaien en stoppen voor de ganse familie, om zieke en oude mensen te bezoeken, om te helpen waar zij kon. Door ziekte gedwongen te rusten, heeft zij zich voorbereid op de grote ontmoeting met haar Goddelijke Meester.

Ten Paradijze geleiden haar nu de engelen.

DIERBARE KINDEREN, KLEINKINDEREN EN ACHTERKLEINKINDEREN, gij waart mijn trots en mijn vreugde ; ik dank u allen voor uw genegenheid en uw liefde ; moge de gedachtenis aan mij u aanzetten om, naar mijn voorbeeld, te leven voor God en voor elkaar. Vergeet mij niet in uw gebeden.

DIERBARE FAMILIELEDEN EN VRIENDEN, ook u dank ik voor uw vele blijken van vriendschap. Blijf deze nu tonen door een goed gebed.

O.-L.-Vrouw van Rust en Vrede, bekom Gij haar nu de eeuwige rust en vrede bij uw Zoon.

64.7.4 Amandine Lesage

64.7.4.1 Her Birth and Early Life

When Amanda (Amandine) Maria Lesage was born in Westrozebeke on September 5, 1895, she entered a bustling family with an elder brother, Cyrille, and an elder sister, Martha. Over time, she would welcome eight younger siblings, making her the last child born in Westrozebeke before the family relocated to Moorslede, near the train station on Statiestraat 518.

By the time World War I erupted, Amanda was 19 years old, and her sister Martha had just reached adulthood. Amanda and her mother Eudoxie, Martha, and her younger siblings fled to Oudezeele in northern France, seeking refuge. Paul, one of her brothers, stayed behind with their father Emile in Ledegem, where the family had moved in July 1912, residing at Kortwagenstraat 33.

The eldest brother, Cyrille, was already a soldier when the war began. While in Oudezeele, two more brothers, Gerard and Hector (both born in 1898), joined the Belgian army. Tragically, Hector and Cyrille lost their lives during the war, while Gerard survived but endured lifelong lung problems caused by gas attacks.

In Oudezeele, Amanda and her family lived with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, near the village center. Their home was listed as number 49 among the refugee residences in Oudezeele during WWI. On September 30, 1921, the Lesage family officially changed their address from Ledegem to Beselare, moving to Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, at the junction with Slangemeersstraat. Paul remained in Ledegem, becoming a harness manufacturer after injuring his arm during a bombardment on July 23, 1917.

The 1920-1930 census of Beselare for Keiberg - Spilstraat 12 confirms Amanda's residence there. However, she disappears from the census records in the following decade. Amanda had only one child, marking the next chapter in her life.

Amanda Maria Lesage passed away on November 28, 1983, in Ypres, leaving behind a legacy of resilience and strength through the tumultuous times of her youth.

The church of Houthulst is 'H,' and the castle that used to belong to Caroline de Patin, described in Chapter 70.8.1.1, is 'P.' The forest south of Houthulst is called 'Vrybosch' and was difficult for the Belgians to take. Since WWI, the Southern part of that forest has been a Belgian military zone.*

64.7.5.1 Introduction

Gerard Medard Lesage's story has been largely forgotten for several reasons, which is a disservice to his memory. After the war, as the eldest surviving son, Gerard likely felt disconnected from his younger siblings, who had either not served in the military or were significantly younger. He died without children, leaving no descendants to carry forward his story. His widow remarried his youngest brother, erasing Gerard's presence from family history.

This chapter seeks to revive Gerard's memory, an endeavor that has proven challenging. We know that Gerard served in the military and suffered lung problems due to a gas attack at the front. There is a photograph of him in military uniform, astride a horse, displaying two front chevrons as proof of his frontline service. However, Belgian military archives do not have his records. They may be lost, or perhaps he served in the French military during the war, a plausible scenario given that some Belgians joined the French forces as foreign soldiers. Gerard's residence in France at the war's outset supports this theory, as does the connection between the Lesage family and the French military, detailed in Chapters 44.8.4 and 64.7.8.5. During WWI, such decisions were not considered treasonous, as Belgium and France were allies.

Our research into the other Lesage children found their appearances on the Beselare census. Gerard appears on the 1920-1930 census, residing at Keiberg - Spilstraat 12, Beselare, but he is absent from the 1930-1940 census. His wife, Magdalena Meersseman, is also not listed, indicating they married after September 30, 1921, and moved elsewhere. Possible locations include Passchendaele, near the border with Moorslede, Vossemolen, or Koekuithoek-Zilverberg. These places were significant to his youngest brother, Daniel Lesage, who later married Gerard's widow.

A cherished memento of Gerard's life is the photograph shown in Figure 64.127, taken from the 1932 marriage certificate of his youngest sister, Irma Lesage, and Michel Declercq. This chapter honors Gerard Lesage by bringing his story back to life, ensuring his contributions and experiences are not forgotten.

64.7.5.2 Birth and Childhood

When he was born, Gerard Medard Lesage (Moorslede 1898—Moorslede 1933) had one elder brother and two elder sisters, Cyrille, Martha, and Amanda. He was the first child of the family born at Moorslede after moving there from Westrozebeke. Later, more siblings would be born, namely Hector, Maria, Paul, Godelieve, Irma, Oscar, and Daniel.

64.7.5.3 His Military Career

Gerard Medard Lesage's military career was nothing short of remarkable. Born in Moorslede, Gerard moved with his family to Ledegem in July 1912. When World War I erupted, 16-year-old Gerard fled with his mother, Eudoxie, and most of his siblings to Oudezeele, France. They found refuge with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, near the village center, a home designated number 49 on the list of refugee homes in Oudezeele during the war.

Gerard's eldest brother, Cyrille, was already a soldier and tragically died in 1916. Motivated by his brother's sacrifice, Gerard joined the military, where he demonstrated exceptional bravery. He served in a cavalry regiment or as an equestrian scout, as indicated by a photograph of him in uniform on horseback (Figure 64.130). Experts deduce from his dark collar flaps and pre-1916 uniform style that he was not a lancer and might have served in the Belgian or French army.

During his service, Gerard endured a harrowing German gas attack, which he narrowly survived. This attack left him with chronic lung problems, a condition that plagued him for the remainder of his life. Despite his weakened state, Gerard continued to exhibit courage and resilience. His brother Hector, inspired by Gerard, also joined the military and was killed in action in October 1918.

Gerard's post-war life was marked by ongoing health struggles due to the gas attack. His compromised lungs made him vulnerable to pneumonia, which ultimately led to his untimely death in 1933 at the age of 35.

Gerard Medard Lesage's legacy as a war hero deserves to be celebrated. His commitment to his country, his bravery in the face of adversity, and the sacrifices he made highlight the profound impact he had on those who knew him and the history of his family. This chapter aims to honor his memory, ensuring that his heroic contributions are never forgotten.

64.7.5.4 His Marriage with Magdalena Meersseman

After WWI, Gerard was probably a soldier for a little longer but would join his parents when they moved to Beselare on September 30, 1921.

After he married Magdalena Meersseman, shown in Figures 64.130 and 64.131, he lived at Passchendaele near the border with Moorslede. The couple would have no children.

After his death, his widow Magdalena married Gerard's youngest brother, Daniel Lesage.

64.7.6 Hector Alidor Lesage

64.7.6.1 Introduction

The existence of Hector Lesage has always been apparent to any of his siblings' descendants because he is buried at the Belgian Military cemetery not far from his family's residences. Unlike his brother Cyrille, who was much older and took part in the heroic onset of the war and the battles at the Yser River, Hector's story is more pitiful. He was not tall, was too young for such responsible decisions, and joined the army at the end of the war mainly because he was seduced by the camaraderie he had noticed of the soccer-playing recruits at Oudezeele, his village in France. He wanted to be one of them, and so he signed up. After a short training, his first engagement was the final assault in October 1918. He was killed after a few days at a few hundred meters from the church of Jonkershove. His destiny was not immediately apparent to his family after the war. He was missing, probably dead, but it took time for the administration to find him in the temporary graves spread over the entire front.

64.7.6.2 Birth and Childhood

When Hector Alidor Lesage (Moorslede, October 9, 1898 - Jonkershove October 4, 1918) was born, in Figure 64.132, he had two brothers, Cyrille and Gerard, and two sisters, Martha and Amanda.

Hector and his two brothers were the three musketeers, all soldiers during WWI.

Cyrille died in 1916, Hector died in 1918, and Gerard died in 1933 after more than a decade of health problems due to a gas attack during the war.

Before the war, in July of 1912, the family had moved to Ledegem and resided at a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. Hector as a child is shown in Figure 64.133.

64.7.6.3 His Residence at Oudezeele in France

When the war began, Cyrille was a military man, and Hector moved with his family to the north of France with the Secq family to Route des Trois Rois 77, the road from the village center to Café des Trois Rois. The house was located near the village center. The home was designated number 49 on the list of refugee homes at Oudezeele during WWI.

64.7.6.4 His Military Career

Hector Lesage, a valiant World War I hero, is steeped in familial sacrifice and personal resolve. His elder brother, Cyrille, had already laid down his life in the conflict, and another brother, Gerard, was severely incapacitated by a gas attack. This tragic backdrop compelled the military to call upon Hector. It is plausible that the drive to avenge his brothers' suffering propelled Hector to join the ranks. His family later reflected that Hector was motivated by the same ideals that drew many young men to the military: camaraderie, a sense of duty, and a passion for soccer.

Hector was part of a large family, with three younger sisters—Maria, Godelieve, and Irma—and three younger brothers—Paul, Oscar, and Daniel. Paul remained at home in Ledegem during the war with their father, Emile.

Hector Lesage enlisted in the First Army Division on April 26, 1918, in Parigné l'Evêque, located in the Sarthe Department of France. He was subsequently assigned to the 22nd Regiment of the Army, First Company, bearing 2884. Born on October 9, 1898, in Moorslede to Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens, Hector's official residence was in Ledegem. His military records denote him as a Soldier Class II in 1918.

On September 28, 1918, Hector participated in the final assault on the Germans at the village of Woumen. Initially, it was believed that he died on that day; however, it was later discovered that he was active until October 4, succumbing to his injuries in Jonkershove after being grievously wounded in the abdomen. He was ultimately laid to rest in the Military Cemetery of Houthulst.

Photographs of Hector depict a young man of modest stature whose life was tragically cut short. These images, referenced in several figures, immortalize his youthful visage and the indomitable spirit that characterized his brief but impactful military service. The presence of horses and stables in these photographs suggests that Hector served as a cavalry soldier, adding another valor to his story.

Photos of Hector as a soldier show that he was not tall and way too young to die, as shown in Figures 64.135, 64.136, 64.138, and 64.137.

Hector did not register for his draft, which led to the later discovery that he had died by the end of WWI.

The documentation reveals a poignant and somewhat confusing account of the Lesage family's military involvement, as detailed in Figure 64.134. The records indicate that the family had two soldiers—one deceased and one missing—though Gerard had also served. It is likely that these numbers should include Hector, suggesting that the family actually had three soldiers: one killed (Cyrille), and two (Hector and Gerard) considered missing at various points.

Gerard, possibly still recovering in France from his lung injury after a gas attack, might not have been counted. Another possibility is that Gerard was a soldier in the French army, as indicated in Chapter 64.7.5, despite appearing post WWI, in a Belgian uniform in photographs.

64.7.6.5 His Death and Burial at Houthulst Military Cemetery

Hector's obituary card is poignantly displayed in 64.77, on page 1228. His fate became shrouded in uncertainty, shown in Figure 64.139, after he last reported for duty at Woumen on September 28, 1918. For a time, his whereabouts remained a mystery. It was later confirmed that Hector met his end at Jonkershove, in Figure 64.140, just a few hundred meters northeast of the local church, at the sole junction in the vicinity.

The early confusion surrounding Hector's demise is evident in conflicting reports. One document dated April 22, 1921, suggested he perished in Merkem, in Figures 64.140 and 64.141, while another claimed his death occurred at Woumen on September 28. The truth was finally pieced together through the testimony of his father, Emile, who meticulously detailed Hector's death at Jonkershove. He stated that Hector fell 300 meters northwest of the junction and was buried on the spot in grave number 10.

The Belgian military later exhumed Hector and reinterred him at the military cemetery in Houthulst. Near the forest, this sacred ground features a commemorative monument honoring the 2nd and 22nd line regiments, which endured heavy casualties during the decisive offensive on September 28, 1918.

Hector's final days are now clearly documented, dispelling the initial confusion. On that fateful September day in 1918, he was stationed at Woumen, ready to join the final assault against the Germans. Tragically, he succumbed to grievous wounds to the lower abdomen on October 4. His initial burial took place on the same day, 300 meters northwest of the Jonkershove junction, in a mass grave designated as '3963 J A F R 3963 G III.' His whereabouts were only confirmed after the mass grave was exhumed, providing closure for his family.

It wasn't until August 14, 1923, that Hector was exhumed and laid to rest once more at the Military Cemetery of Houthulst, as depicted in Figures 64.142 and 64.143, in grave number 528 N. The arduous process took five long years, during which his family awaited the chance to bid a proper farewell to their beloved son. Hector's death registration, a solemn testament to his sacrifice, is shown in Figures 64.144 and 64.145.

The tale of Hector Alidor Lesage's final stand and final resting place is a stark reminder of the chaos and relentless toll of the Great War, capturing the enduring grief and heroism of those who fought and fell.

64.7.6.6 His Distinctions

He served 1 month and 8 days at the front after spending 3 months and 26 days in the army. Because of this short duration, he has not received any front stripes (chevrons). On November 27, 1925, he received, posthumous, a Knighthood[35] and the Croix de Guerre (reference 20761). Having contributed to the final attack on the Germans, he also received the Victory Medal in Figure 64.146

64.7.6.7 His Military Records

His military records are found in Figures 64.147, 64.148, 64.149, 64.150, 64.151 and 64.152.

Later, she would have more siblings, namely Paulus, Godelieve, Irma, Oscar and Daniel. At Moorslede, she lived near the train station in Statiestraat 518.

In July 1912, the family moved to Ledegem to a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. Everything went well until WWI started in the

VROME GEDACHTENIS AAN MEVROUW

Maria - Magdalena LESAGE

weduwe van de heer JULES MAESEN

geboren te Moorslede op 18 maart 1900 en godvruchtig overleden te Ieper in het Onze-Lieve-Vrouwhospitaal op 27 juli 1980, gesterkt door de sakramenten van de zieken.

Lid van verscheidene godvruchtige genootschappen van de parochie.

Onze moeder is gestorven. Haar gaven en weldaden blijven.

Zij was onze moeder in de dagen van onze hulpbehoevende jeugd, in de dagen van voorspoed en vreugde en vooral in deze van bezorgdheid en verdriet. Zij werkte hard op het bedrijf om haar man bij te staan en voor haar talrijke kinders te zorgen. Altijd was zij bezig, onvermoeibaar deed zij het ene werk na het andere.

Zij was er blij om dat het grootste deel van haar kinders rond haar bleven in het gezin. Het was een teken dat zij er tevreden waren.

In het werk van iedere dag vond zij haar vreugde. Bidden en werken en zorgen was haar levensregel.

Zij wist wat een kristen moeder doen moest en leefde ernaar.

Omringd door de genegenheid van haar kinders heeft zij een rustige levensavond gekend en bereidde zich voor om waardig te worden van de eeuwige vreugde.

Vaarwel dierbare kinders en kleinkind dank u voor uw genegenheid en goede zorgen. Ik ga vader en Daniel terugzien in de Hemel. Ik vertrouw U toe aan Gods Voorzienigheid en zal verder voor u zorgen.

Heilig Hart van Jezus ik heb vertrouwen in U.

summer of 1914.

During the German invasion of Belgium, she fled to Oudezeele in the North of France, close to the Belgian border, with her mother and most of her siblings. Her father, Emile Lesage, stayed at the farm in Ledegem with Paul while Cyrille was in the military. Later, the other sons, Gerard and Hector, would also join the military after moving with their mother to Oudezeele.

In Oudezeele, they lived with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, the road from the village center to Café des Trois Rois, the house near the village center. The home was designated number 49 on the list of refugee families at Oudezeele during WWI.

On September 30, 1921, the family changed its official address from Ledegem to Beselare, Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, at the junction with Slangemeersstraat.

Maria can be found in the census of Beselare for the period 1920-1930 and equally the period 1930-1940.[36]

64.7.7.2 Her Birth

Maria Lesage was born in Moorslede in 1900, in Figure 64.153.

64.7.7.3 Marie Magdalena Lesage and her Husband, Jules Maesen

A wedding photo is shown in Figure 64.154. Jules Maesen was born in Zonnebeke and received the 'Croix du feu' (Vuurkruis), as in Figure 64.155, after WWI for his role in the war[37].

A la pieuse Mémoire de
MONSIEUR
Frans-Jules-Cornelius MAESEN
né à Renaix le 16 août 1960 et décédé accidentellement à Thumaide le 30 octobre 1982.

Frans nous laissera le souvenir d'un garçon doux, aimable, estimé de ses compagnons et surtout, courageux au travail.

A la mort accidentelle de son père, il voulut reprendre avec sa maman l'exploitation agricole familiale ; il apporta un dévouement et un courage inlassables pour faire prospérer l'entreprise.

Hélas ! la mort est venue le surprendre à la fleur de l'âge, brisant une existence riche d'espoir.

C'est dans notre foi et l'espérance chrétienne que nous puiserons la seule vraie consolation : celle de savoir que son âme est appelée à vivre la vie de Dieu et à partager son bonheur et que nous le retrouverons après cette vie, pour ressusciter avec lui.

Notre Dame, qui avez tenu dans vos bras votre Fils mort sur la Croix, accueillez votre enfant Frans et introduisez son âme auprès de Dieu.

Godvruchtige Herinnering aan
MIJNHEER
Frans-Jules-Cornelius MAESEN
geboren te Ronse op 16 augustus 1960
en, bij een smartelijk ongeluk, overleden te Thumaide op 30 oktober 1982.

Wij zullen de gemoedelijkheid, de vriendschap en de werklust van Frans nooit vergeten.

Bij het plotseling overlijden van vader, had Frans, naast moeder, het boerenbedrijf moedig in handen genomen. De afwezigheid van vader was soms ondraagbaar maar hard werken wordt beloond en alles ging goed op het hof, te goed...

Als een dief in de nacht, is de dood Frans van ons komen wegrukken... Moeder blijft nu alleen achter... Familie en vrienden staan verstomd en treuren.

Alleen een diep geloof, een ware hoop en een stille toevlucht tot het gebed kunnen ons leed wat milderen.

Kristus beweent, naast ons, de dood van Frans ; Kristus heeft de dood overwonnen : Hij is verrezen. Kristus zegt ons : « Wie in mij gelooft zal eeuwig leven. »

Onze Lieve Vrouw, Moeder van God, wees ons een steun in ons lijden om het heengaan van Frans.

Heilige Theresia, moge Frans, met U, nu pas beginnen leven.

Mevrouw Daniel-André MAESEN-VERBORGH, zijn moeder ;
Juffrouwen Yvonne en Jeanne MAESEN, zijn tanten ;
De Heren Gérard en Michel MAESEN, zijn onkels ;

---

[36] This is strange because she had her first child in 1926 and should appear on the census with her husband. Perhaps the other Maria Lesage, who would marry Joseph Ziller, stayed with the family before she married. Maybe she was a cousin of the Lesages and was welcomed into the family. We don't know. Joseph Ziller is described in Chapter 64.7.8. Even more intriguing is a 'Godelieve Maria Lesage,' born in Ledegem on June 21, 1908. Her father was also called Emile Theophile Lesage, a 40-year-old farmer born in Moorslede and residing in Ledegem. The mother was Elodie Tailleu, a 39-year-old farmer born in Moorslede and equally living in Ledegem. It concerns another family, but the name similarities are surprising. This Godelieve Maria Lesage even had a sister, Martha Bertha Lesage, born at Ledegem in 1907. Perhaps this 'Maria Lesage' also stayed with Eudoxie in Oudezeele during WWI, and maybe this is how a family bond was created with another Maria Lesage. They were perhaps just close acquaintances in Ledegem, and that's how they knew each other. Maria Lesage married Joseph Ziller, who was described further as someone who had a very close bond with our family.

64.7.7.4 Her Death

Maria Lesage died in 1980. Her death announcement and mortuary card are shown in Figures 64.156 and 64.157.

64.7.7.5 Their Offspring

The Maesen-Lesage family had five children. The eldest child, Daniel Maesen (1926 - 1976), married Godelieve Verborgh. He was the only one who established a family, and they lived in Moustier, near Frasnes-Les-Avaing. The other children, in order of birth, were Ivonne Maesen (died before 2020), Jeanne Maesen (born on September 18, 1930, and she died, in Figure 64.181 on February 3, 2024, in Zonnebeke), Gerard Maesen (died before 2020), and Michel Maesen (born in Zonnebeke on August 28, 1939, and died, in Figure 64.158, in Zonnebeke on April 6, 2020). Despite having five children, the family reached a tragic end for two main reasons. Jules Maesen sadly died in a car accident, and his only child, Frans, also perished in a car accident a few years later. The other descendants of the Maesen-Lesage family were so focused on their possessions, consumed by greed and suspicion, that they never married and lived together until their deaths. They owned a vast farm in Zonnebeke, but what is the purpose of owning land if one has no life and no sense of purpose?

The author's father, Maurice, extended his help to Godelieve Verborgh, Daniel's widow, and frequently visited Moustier to assist her with her garden and enjoy the farm life away from the hustle and bustle of Deerlijk, returning to his farm roots. Moustier, where Godelieve lived, was more accessible from Deerlijk than from Zonnebeke. Offering help was second nature to Maurice and Godelieve, who had endured a miserable life and found solace in chatting with her cousin-in-law rather than her brothers-in-law. Maurice was Godelieve's link to the outside world, her cornerstone, and her freedom.

The author knew Godelieve Verborgh very well, visiting her frequently with his father in Moustier. After her son's death, Godelieve was very lonely but refused to leave Moustier because it was where her husband and son were buried. Her situation was perfectly understandable, yet she could not find peace tragically. Her son's bedroom remained undisturbed until her death as if he could return any day. She had only disturbed the room once when she moved from her farm to a house on Rue de Grandmetz in Moustier, where she recreated the room as if her son could return home at any moment.

The author takes care of the gravestones in Moustier mainly out of respect for Frans Maesen, who had to balance his education with farming after his father's death. He must have been a very courageous and exemplary young man. For example, while his schoolmates ate quietly in the refectory, Frans had to eat his sandwiches on the tractor while quickly working a piece of land. Tragically, such a brave young man had to die so early. Frans' fiancée never abandoned her would-be mother-in-law, visiting Godelieve weekly. Godelieve cherished these visits and was glad that Frans' fiancée had found another husband and had children, though the thought that those children could have been her grandchildren was painful. Life can indeed be harsh and bitter. Godelieve deserved a better life; she was correct and generous, and the author remains grateful.

Perhaps she recognized her son Frans in him, appreciating his dedication to combining school and family life during his education. The tomb of Daniel Maesen and Godelieve Verborgh is shown in Figure 64.159. The obituary card of their son Frans Maesen is shown in Figure 64.160, and his tomb is shown in Figure 64.161.

O, die het nog gegeven is uw moeder te begraven, gij weet nog niet wat moeder is...
Maar als het liefste weg zal zijn
dat gij bewaart op aarde, dan zult gij voelen aan de pijn
wie U het leven baarde.

(Reypens)

Een levenlang werken en zorgen, zichzelf niets ontzien, is de herinnering die we in ons blijven dragen van onze dierbare overledene.

God heeft haar bij Zich geroepen, na een leven van liefde, plicht en stille eenvoud voor het welzijn van haar gezin. Paula was een ingoede en diepgelovige vrouw en alhoewel haar zo onverwacht heengaan ons bedroeft, voelen we ons gelukkig om al het schone dat zij ons als lieve echtgenote en ingoede moeder heeft geschonken.

Wij danken U, Heer God, voor deze lieve echtgenote en minzame moeder, die ons zo nabij en dierbaar was, en die nu is weggevallen uit onze leefwereld. Doorheen haar leven hebben wij Uw milde liefde voor ons tastbaar mogen aanvoelen. Moge zij nu voor eeuwig geborgen zijn in Uw barmhartige liefde. En laat het gebed in deze eucharistieviering die wij nu voor haar opdragen, de band blijven die ons over de dood heen, aan elkaar blijft binden tot de dag komt van het eeuwig weerzien bij GOD.

GOD, U geeft ons dierbaren en neemt hen weer van ons weg.
Bij hen zijn nu onze gedachten.
Neem onze onrust en onze droefheid op in Uw vrede en maak ons sterk, in de verwachting dat het Leven
het wint op de dood, nu en in de eeuwen der eeuwen. Amen.

† BIDT GOD TOT ZIELELAAFNIS
van Mijnheer
Joseph ZILLER
echtgenoot van Mevrouw Maria LESAGE
geboren te Jarville departement Meurthe et Moselle Frankrijk, den 9 Juni 1889 en godvruchtig overleden te Oostnieuwkerke op 4 Mei 1939.
Gewezen lid der Fransche Politie en oorlogsinvalied.
Vereerd met de bijzonderste eereteekens van het Fransche leger.

Het leven is, geen vrede alhier
geen wapenstilstand vragen ;
Het leven is de kruisbanier
Tot in Gods handen dragen. G. G.

De duurbare afgestorvene heeft de waarheid van dit levenswoord aan den lijve gevoeld. Met eere en roem heeft hij zijn land gediend in droeven oorlogstijd. En hij werd het slachtoffer van zijn harden plicht. De wereldoorlog, reeds 20 jaar geleden, maakt nu nog slachtoffers. Mocht hun offer ons bekomen het behoud van den vrede in rechtvaardigheid en liefde.

Hij was vriendelijk en goed. Altijd blij en opgeruimd en altijd dienstvaardig. Zijn aandenken zal in zegen blijven. Hij had niets dan vrienden.

Duurbare echtgenoote, zoo vroeg reeds moet ik u verlaten. Saam hebben wij wel en wee van 't leven gedeeld. Heb dank voor uw trouwe liefde en goede zorgen. Wees moedig en zoek troost in uw geloof. Tot wederziens.

Gij allen, die mij hebt bemind, bidt voor mij.

Zoet Hart van Maria, wees mijne zaligheid

WEDUWE VAN DE HEER CAMIEL VERHAEGHE

geboren te Moorslede op 18 augustus 1903 en godvruchtig overleden in de H. Hartkliniek te Roeselare op 23 juni 1990, gesterkt door de sakramenten der zieken.

- Lid van de K.B.G.

Wanneer mensen van het slag van Godelieve zich neerleggen, dan mag men er zeker van zijn dat het zeer ernstig wordt.
Sterke constituties moeten ook eens begeven Zijzelf was bewust van haar wankelbare toestand en was blij de sakramenten der zieken te ontvangen. Zij liet nog een H.Mis opdragen en zeer moedig doorstond zij haar laatste zichtdagen, daarin gesteund door de beste zorgen van haar goede familie.
Wat heeft zij in haar leven, dat zo lang fris bewaard bleef, niet gedaan! Vijfendertig jaar, geleden verloor zij haar dierbare man, terwijl haar zoon soldaat was en haar dochter getrouwd. Maar moedig heeft zij er zich doorgeslagen en de mooie hoeve rechtgehouden.
Wat haar het meest bekommerde en zeer dicht aanging, dat was haar gezin, haar man, kinderen en achteraf nog haar kleinkinderen en achterkleinkinderen. Voor hen heeft zij geheel haar sterke persoon ingezet.
Rechtgeaard als zij was, wist men al gauw wat men aan haar had. Onverbloemd en zonder omwegen was haar taal en toch was ze goedhartig en mild. Zij was een diep-gelovige vrouw.

Koude, hitte, regen, wind of sneeuw konden haar niet van de kerk afhouden. Hoe dikwijls werd zij als de kloeke vrouw bewonderend nagekeken, wanneer zij van huis de lange tocht met de fiets maakte naar de Zondagsmis, waar zij nooit te laat arriveerde, integendeel!
Zij was eenvoudig in haar geloof, onwankelbaar in haar Godsvertrouwen, diep in haar geloofsovertuiging. ''Wie op God betrouwt, heeft op een rots gebouwd''. Zij heeft dan ook het grote geluk gekend, in haar vertrouwde omgeving te kunnen blijven tot daags voor haar sterven. Wij zijn dan ook overtuigd dat je welgekomen zal zijn bij de Heer en bidden: Wij danken U, Heer, voor deze vrouw die ons zo dierbaar was.
Om het werk van haar naarstige handen en om het geloof en vertrouwen waarmee zij, al die jaren werkte aan het geluk van haar gezin.
Wij danken U om de eenvoud en de trouw waarmee zij door het leven ging.
Wij danken U om de vriendschap die van haar is uitgegaan: haar heengaan schokt de wereld niet maar wij worden allen armer als de goedheid van hen die heengaan niet blijft voortleven in ons.
Geliefde kinderen, kleinkinderen en achterkleinkinderen, dank om uw grote zorg en liefde, laat uw leed uitmonden in gebed dat uw geloof opwekt in een leven dat eeuwig blijft en ons allen wacht door Kristus die verrezen is.

Om uw gebeden en deelneming danken U:

Weduwe van Heer
JULES VERHAEGHE
geboren te Beselare den 30 Oktober 1869 en aldaar overleden den 5 Juni 1947, bediend door het H. Oliesel

Tot ons geluk hebt Gij ons haar gegeven, o Heer, en nu vraagt Gij ons haar terug. Wij onderwerpen ons zonder tegenspreken, niet zonder droefheid.
(H. Ephr.).

Deugdzame vrouw en moeder, de wet der zachtmoedigheid was op haar tong; Zij was vol geloof en een goed hart was haar ten deele gevallen. In hare blijmoedigheid was zij steeds de vreugde van man en kinderen.

Een langen levensloop heeft zij beleefd standvastig en onwankelbaar in haar geloof, totdat zij, uitgeput van krachten, de kroon des levens is gaan ontvangen uit de handen van den rechtvaardigen Rechter.
(H. Paulus).

Toen het groot lijden harer ziekte haar overviel, heeft zij lijdensvolle dagen en bange nachten doorgebracht. Zij werd gedrukt onder den last harer smarten, maar met verduldigheid en overgeving aan Gods wil heeft zij haar pijnen gedragen. Zij was geacht en bemind en haar gedachtenis zal in eere blijven.

Duurbare Kinderen en Kleinkinderen, twee dagen naeen heeft de engel des doods onze familie bezocht, om nu ook moeder bij Ons Heer te brengen. Het heeft Hem zóó behaagd, zooals het is geschied.

De dood breekt de liefde niet. Wees de wijze lessen uwer ouders indachtig. Bidt voor mij en eens vinden wij ons allen terug in de eeuwige zaligheid.

64.7.8 Paul Ireneus Lesage

64.7.8.1 Introduction

Readers may be interested in reading Chapter 44.8.3 first.

Paulus Ireneus Lesage (Moorslede, June 19, 1902 - Roeselare, September 1, 1976) had three brothers when he was born and three sisters: Cyrille, Martha, Amandine, Gerard, Hector and Maria. Later, he would have two more brothers and two sisters, Godelieve, Irma, Oscar, and Daniel.

Paul was born in Moorslede, near the train station in Statiestraat 518.

In July 1912, the family moved to Ledegem to a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. Everything went well until WWI started in the summer of 1914. During the Germans' invasion of Belgium, Eudoxie fled to Oudezeele in northern France, close to the Belgian border.

Emile Lesage stayed at the farm in Ledegem with Paul while Cyrille was in the military. Later, the other sons, Gerard and Hector, would join the military after moving with their mother to Oudezeele.

On July 23, 1917, Emile Lesage and Paul were expelled from their village of Ledegem and went to Wielsbeke.

Paul had his arm severely injured during a bombardment on August 1, 1916, while he was peeling potatoes. Emile and Paul stayed a couple of months at the farm of the Declercq family.

Paul Lesage was the same age as the eldest son of the Declercq family.

The official Belgian address of the entire Lesage-Lammens family remained at Ledegem throughout, although nobody lived there anymore from July 1917 onwards.

On September 30, 1921, the family changed its official address from Ledegem to Beselare, Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, at the junction with Slangemeersstraat. Paul Lesage, however, stayed at Ledegem and would, given that he had an injured arm on July 23, 1917, due to a bombardment, become a harness manufacturer.

64.7.8.2 His Birth

64.7.8.3 About Petrus Jules Herpoelaert

Petrus Jules Herpoelaert was the brother-in-law of Paul Lesage.

We refer to his military registration in Nationale Militie, lichting van 1914, 36e militiekanton, gemeente Ledeghem. We found in register 18 that Petrus Jules Herpoelaert was a blacksmith, born in Ledegem on October 24, 1894, son of Désiré Herpoelaert from Oostnieuwkerke and Eustasie Euphrasie Vanraes from Beselare.

He died in Dentergem on November 2, 1918, during the liberation of Belgium by the Belgian armed forces.

His death certificate appears on the same page as that of Hector Lesage in Figure 64.163, described in Chapter 64.7.6.

64.7.8.4 His Marriage and Offspring

Paul Lesage was married, in Figure 64.164, to Maria Magdalena Herpoelaert (1897-1967), daughter of Désiré Herpoelaert (1869-1946) and Eustasie Anastasie Vanraes (1864). They had one child, Gaston Lesage, who married Paula Demuynck, daughter of Albert Demuynck and Maria Decuypere. Paul Lesage was born in Moorslede on June 19, 1902, and died in Roeselare on September 1, 1976.

In Chapter 44, we described Paul's presence at a Banquet in Deerlijk in 1933, where the picture in Figure 64.165 was taken.

The photo in Figure 64.166 was taken during a visit to the Zoo of Antwerp 1938. We don't know who joined the journey, but in the picture, we can see Désiré Herpoelaert, father of Maria Herpoelaert, who lived with Paul Lesage and Maria Herpoelaert at Ledegem en would die there in 1946. His death is shown in Figure 64.167.

We can also see Paul Lesage with his wife, Maria Herpoelaert.

Daniel Lesage was next to Désiré Herpoelaert, who was, since 1934, married to Magdalena Meersseman.

On the right is Joseph Ziller, who would die in 1939, husband of Maria Lesage.[38]

---

[38] This particular Maria Lesage was probably not related and should not be confused with Maria Lesage, who was married to Jules Maesen. It probably concerns Godelieve Maria Lesage, born in Ledegem in a Lesage family from Moorslede, on June 21, 1908, daughter of another Emile Theophile Lesage and Elodie Taillieu.

Paul Lesage's son, Gaston, was married to Paula Demuynck. Her death documents are presented in Figures 64.169 and 64.170. Their tomb is seen in Figure 64.168.

64.7.8.5 About Joseph Ziller

He is also mentioned in Chapter 44.8.4. Joseph Ziller can be found in Figure 64.166, taken at the Zoo in Antwerp in 1938. He was married to Maria Lesage. Nevertheless, this was not Maria Lesage, daughter of Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens. Joseph Ziller was likely a family friend since their stay at Oudezeele and was, as a coincidence, married to Maria Lesage. Or else, this Maria Lesage was the family of Emile Lesage. The fact that the Lesage family spoke French must have strengthened their bond because Joseph was French. In Figure 64.171, his obituary card insinuates that he died in 1939 because of health consequences related to WWI.

Interestingly, we found a Godelieve Maria Lesage, born at Ledegem on June 21, 1908, daughter of Emile Theophile Lesage (not our Emile Theophile Lesage) and Elodie Taillieu. Her brother was Leon Lesage, born at Ledegem in 1905 and died in Roeselare in 1999. Likely, the two families knew each other from either Ledegem or Moorslede. Perhaps this Godelieve Maria Lesage even joined Eudoxie to Oudezele in France when WWI began and went to know Joseph Ziller there. Joseph Ziller's tomb is also shown in Figure 64.171.

64.7.9 Godelieve Angela Lesage

64.7.9.1 A Brief Description

The author knows Godelieve Lesage and has met her several times with Daniel Lesage. She was already over 80 years old. She can be seen in Figure 64.172.

When Godelieve Angela Lesage (Moorslede August 18, 1903 - Roeselare, June 23, 1990) was born, in Figure 64.173, she had three sisters, Martha, Amanda, and Maria; and four brothers, Cyrille, Gerard, Hector, and Paul. Later, two more brothers, Oscar and Daniel, and one sister, Irma, would follow.

Godelieve was born and raised in Moorslede (Statiestraat 518) and moved to Ledegem, where the family had a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33. When WWI started, her eldest brother, Cyrille, was in the military and died in 1916. Two more brothers became military during the war Gerard and Hector. In October of 1914, the latter died, while Gerard, a gas attack victim, died of health problems in 1933.

Godelieve stayed with her mother, Eudoxie, and her siblings in Oudezeele during the war. They remained with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, the road from the village center to Café des Trois Rois, the house being located near the village center. The home was designated number 49 on the list of homes of refugees at Oudezeele during WWI. Godelieve's father, Emile, and her elder brother, Paul, had not joined them but stayed in Ledegem at the family farm.

On September 30, 1921, the whole family changed its official address from Ledegem to Beselare, Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, at the junction with Slangemeersstraat. Godelieve lived there in the 1920s and also a period in the 1930s until she married.

64.7.9.2 Her Marriage and Offspring

She was married to Camille Achiel Verhaeghe, born in 1898 in Beselare, and he died at Beselare in 1955. They had a daughter, Maria Verhaeghe, in Figure 64.174, born in 1935, married to Raymond Vulsteke (1926-2001).

They had a son, Jules Verhaeghe (1936-2001), also in Figure 64.174, who was married to Rachel Vangheluwe.

64.7.9.3 Her Death

Godelieve Lesage died in 1990. Her mortuary card is presented in Figure 64.175.

64.7.9.4 Some Memorabilia

Some memorabilia are shown in Figures 64.176, 64.177, 64.178 and 64.179.

64.7.10 Irma Helena Lesage

She is the author's grandmother, and her life is extensively described in Chapter 45.2. She was the great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Adrienne de Patin (DP12) and was born in 1905 in Moorslede, Belgium, as the daughter of Emile Theophile Lesage and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens.

She married Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) and died in 1953 in Kortrijk, Belgium. She is now buried in the family grave established by the author, in Figure 64.180.

She is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2 as the great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 68 in the 't Kint ancestry line; in Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); and Chapter 71 as the granddaughter of Clemens Lammens and Natalia Juliana Decaestecker.

Dierbare gedachtenis aan :

DE HEER

Oscar LESAGE

Echtgenoot van mevrouw Anna SOENEN

Geboren te Moorslede op 13 juni 1906 en overleden te Roeselare in het H. Hartziekenhuis op 10 september 1990, gesterkt door het
Sacrament der zieken.

Oudstrijder 1940-1945
Lid van de bond der gepensioneerden

In de ouderdom van 84 jaar is deze goede echtgenoot, vader en grootvader langzaam en rustig naar de Heer gegaan. Zoals de natuur stilaan haar winterslaap ingaat om te ontwaken in een nieuwe lente, zo is het lichaam van Oscar ten dode afgetakeld om te verrijzen in een nieuw en eeuwig leven bij God.
Het kroostrijk landbouwersgezin, waarin hij werd geboren, werd bij het op de vlucht slaan een tijdlang uit elkaar gehaald tijdens de oorlog 14-18. Twee van zijn broers zijn ook heel jong gestorven.
Samen met Anna, zijn goede vrouw heeft hij in Beselare een schoon gezin gesticht met drie zonen en drie dochters. Hij heeft veel en hard gewerkt voor het geluk en welzijn van zijn vrouw en kinderen. Hij was vergroeid met de boerderij. Met hart en ziel, met wijsheid en kunde, met toewijding en geduld heeft hij het land bewerkt en bezaaid en zijn dieren verzorgd. De paarden waren zijn lievelingsdieren. Dat was wellicht gekomen door bij het paardevolk te zijn bij het leger.
Toen de kinderen allen op hun plaats waren konden Anna en Oscar samen genieten van een gelukkige en schone oude dag in Passendale. Nu had Oscar er zijn tuin als dagelijkse bezigheid, of hij zich jeunde. Spijtig genoeg werd dit stille geluk verbroken door het veel te vroege afsterven van zijn zoon. Hij heeft het nooit helemaal kunnen verwerken. Het kruis was te zwaar om dragen, na alles wat hij vroeger al meegemaakt had.
Als gelovig mens heeft hij in zijn dagelijks gebed en wekelijkse zondagsmis steun en sterkte gezocht om de lasten en de miseries van het leven te kunnen dragen. Moge God hem nu opnemen voor een welverdiende rust in de hemel.
Dierbare echtgenote, meer dan 50 jaar hebben we lief en leed samen gedragen en het beste van onszelf gegeven voor ons gezin. Dank voor alles wat ge voor mij gedaan hebt en geweest zijt. Wees moedig en sterk. Vaarwel en tot weerziens.
Geliefde kinderen, kleinkinderen en achterkleinkinderen, dank voor uw kinderlijke genegenheid, dank voor uw vele bezoekjes thuis en in het ziekenhuis. Blijf eensgezind en draag zorg voor moeder. Vergeet mij niet in uw gebed en stel het goed.
Een woord van oprechte dank aan allen die mij verzorgd en genegen waren.
Onze Vader ... Wees gegroet ...

Gelovig danken wij voor en denken wij aan
het leven van
MEVROUW
Anna SOENEN
Weduwe van de Heer Oscar LESAGE

Geboren te Beselare op 2 januari 1908 en overleden in het O.-L.Vrouwziekenhuis te St. Jan Ieper op woensdag 22 april 1992, gesterkt door het sakrament van de zieken.

Midden de paasvreugde, in de volle lente, wanneer alles herleeft, groeit en bloeit, is Anna zachtjes van ons heengegaan naar het eeuwig leven. Ze heeft jarenlang met hart en ziel geleefd midden in de natuur als een echte boerin op de hoeve te Beselare, met een grote liefde voor het land en de dieren.

Anna was vooral een trouwe echtgenote voor vader zaliger en een goeie moeder voor haar groot gezin. Toen ze reeds op rust was stelde ze haar nog ten dienste van de kinderen door het naaiwerk te doen. Ze zag haar kinderen gaarne en het deed haar veel pijn toen ze één van hen zag aftakelen en sterven door een vreselijke ziekte. Het werd een zwaar kruis en een dikke streep door de gelukkige oude dag van vader en haarzelf. Dat kon je steeds horen bij een bezoekje.

Het ziek worden van haar goede echtgenoot werd een zware last en een grote bekommernis. Ze kon zelf bijna geen weg en toch moest ze de sterkste zijn. Als vader in het ziekenhuis werd opgenomen is zij gaan inwonen bij Maria en Raymond. Ze was daar heel graag en werd er ook goed verzorgd. Geleidelijk werden haar lichaamskrachten zwakker en haar gang moeilijker. Een kwalijke val werd haar verleden jaar bijna fataal. Na een lange herstelperiode kwam ze weer naar huis en werd ze nooit meer alleen gelaten. Ze bleef moedig en klaagde nooit.

Onlangs werd ze opnieuw getroffen en na wekenlange angst en bezorgdheid van de kinderen is moeder zonder enig woord van afscheid gestorven. Een verlossing voor haar.

Anna was een diep gelovige vrouw, die steun en sterkte vond in haar dagelijks gebed en in de H. Communie thuis ter gelegenheid van elke hoogdag. Moge God haar nu opnemen voor een welverdiende rust in de hemel bij allen van de familie die haar zijn voorgegaan.

Geliefde kinderen, kleinkinderen en achterkleinkinderen, gij waart mijn vreugde maar ook mijn dagelijkse bekommernis. Dank voor uw vele bezoekjes en voor alles wat ge voor mij en vader gedaan hebt. Dank omdat ik mocht inwonen bij U wanneer het alleen niet meer ging. Wees gelukkig met elkaar en stel het allemaal goed. Vergeet ons niet in uw gebed.

Beste familie en vrienden, dank voor uw genegenheid en uw bezoekjes. Bid allen voor ons : Onze Vader... Wees gegroet...

De families SOENEN - BRUTIN
LESAGE - LAMMENS
danken u voor uw gebed en blijken van christelijk medeleven.

64.7.11 Oscar Petrus Lesage

Because Oscar Lesage was closest in age to his brother Daniel, who the author knew well, the author frequently heard about Oscar. He is shown in Figure 64.182.

64.7.11.1 His Birth and Youth

Oscar Petrus Lesage (Moorslede, June 13, 1906 - Roeselare, September 10, 1990) was born one year after Irma Lesage, in Figure 64.183. He had many siblings: Cyrille, Martha, Amandine, Gerard, Hector, Maria, Paulus, Godelieve, and Irma. Later, Daniel would be born when Oscar was five years old. The family lived in Moorslede when Oscar was born, near the train station at Statiestraat 518.

In July 1912, the family moved to Ledegem to a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33.

During the German invasion of Belgium in WWI, Oscar fled to Oudezeele, with his mother and most of the siblings, in the North of France, close to the Belgian border. Emile Lesage stayed at the farm in Ledegem with Paul while Cyrille was in the military. Later, the other sons, Gerard and Hector, joined the military after moving with their mother to Oudezeele.

The family lived in Oudezeele with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, the road from the village center to Café des Trois Rois. The house was near the village center. The home was designated number 49 on the list of refugee homes at Oudezeele during WWI. The family consisted of two adults (+ children), and Eudoxie was registered as Mme Eudoxie Lesage.

The two adults were Eudoxie and her eldest daughter Martha.

On September 30, 1921, the family changed its official address from Ledegem to Beselare, Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, at the junction with Slangemeersstraat. In the meantime, Oscar went, with his younger brother, to school in Beitem at Sint Lodewijkschool and moved, with his wife, to the parents' home in Beselare in the 1930s. The young Oscar Lesage appears in Figure 64.182.

64.7.11.2 His Marriage and Offspring

Oscar Lesage and Anna Soenen, shown in Figure 64.182, had the following children: Maria Lesage (1934-2005), who married Raymond Decoster; Andrea Lesage (1936), who married Gery Sioen (1934-2015); Marcel Lesage, who married Maria Depraetere; Jeanne Lesage, who married Pierre Segaert (1932-2020), Antoon Lesage (1943-1987), who married Marie José Vandenbussche, and Gerard Lesage (1947-2011), who married Christiane Hoflack (1947-1999).

The census of Beselare does not list Oscar Lesage in 1920-1930. He appears with his wife Anna Soenen and his daughters Maria and Andrea on the census of 1930-1940, Keiberg, Spilstraat 12. Therefore, he lived elsewhere before he married, just like his brother, Daniel Lesage.

He would continue to live with his family on his parent's farm in Beselare.

The author has warm memories of Andrea Lesage and Gery Sioen and is still in touch with Stefaan Lesage, a wise grandson of Oscar Lesage and son of Gerard Lesage (1947-2011).

64.7.11.3 His Military Service during the Interbellum and WWII

He was born in Moorslede on June 13, 1906, and joined the army in the class of 1926. He lived in Beselare when the army recruited him on December 1, 1925, although we did not find him in the census. His military records show that he was 1.68 m tall, his weight was 67 kg, and his thorax was 87.

He was recited as a soldier militias 26 in the 13th Artillery Regiment, registered as number 8762.

When the army recruited him, he was already married to Anna Bertha Soenen.

His military records lists his characteristics as follows:

Taille: 1m 68cm. (Size: 1m 68cm)
Visage: plein. (Face: full)
Teint: Coloré. (Complexion: Colorful)
Front inclinaison: fuyant. (Front tilt: fleeing)
Front Hauteur : Moyen. (Front Height: Medium)
Front largeur : moyen. (Front width: medium)
Yeux : bleu. (Blue eyes)
Nez base : horizontal. (Nose base: horizontal)
Nez hauteur : moyen. (Nose height: medium)
Nez largeur : grand. (Nose width: large)
Nez Forme : camus. (Nose Shape: Camus)
Bouche : moyenne. (Palate: medium)
Lèvres : moyennes. (Lips: medium)
Menton : ordinaire. (Chin: ordinary)
Cheveux : châtains clairs. (Hair: light browns)
Sourcils : châtains clairs. (Eyebrows: light browns)
Signes particulier : blessure auriculaire droit. (Particular signs: right atrial injury)
Langue Flamant. (Flemish language)
Specialité militaire : conducteur. (military specialty : horse rider)
Profession : cultivateur. (Profession: farmer)
He became an active soldier on July 31, 1926, and was released on August 31, 1927. On May 27, 1929, he was recruited again and released on June 9. On October 1, 1936, he presented himself to the army.
In September 1938, he was recruited in the 2nd regiment of hulptroepen (Auxiliary troops).
On January 14, 1940, he was stationed at home, where he had four children. On May 10, 1940, he was recruited again as a cavalry soldier, shown in Figure 64.184.
On June 4, 1940, he was reported as missing. Other images of Oscar as a military are shown in Figures 64.184, 64.185 and 64.186. Experts to whom Figure 64.185 was shown noted that the spurs on the boots and the style of their trousers indicate that they were cavalry. The weapons were the Mauser Carabin model 1889. They are wearing the First Company uniform model 1915. Further details revealed that it was probably an artillery-on-horse regiment (Régiment d' Artillerie 'a Cheval – RACH) based at Leuven and Namur.
When WWII started, Oscar Lesage became a military again in May 1940 and took part in the 10-day war between Belgium and Germany.
Oscar Lesage's military records until Belgium's capitulation in 1940 are shown in Figures 64.187 and 64.188.

64.7.11.4 His Death

Oscar Lesage died on September 10, 1990, in Figure 64.189, and was buried on September 15 at Passchendaele. Anna Soenen died in 1992, in Figure 64.190.

64.7.11.5 Some Memorabilia

Oscar Lesage and Anna Soenen sent a postcard, presented in Figure 64.191.

64.7.12 Daniel Abel Lesage

He was like a grandfather to the author. It's primarily thanks to Daniel that the author knows how the Lesage family was and possibly how the more distant relatives of de Patin must have been, illustrated in Figure 64.192.

64.7.12.1 Introduction

By the end of the 1920s, Daniel Abel Lesage had earned the moniker of the 'million-dollar bachelor.' As the youngest son and the only unmarried member of his family, he enjoyed considerable support from his father and brothers, mainly due to the limitations imposed by a slightly handicapped left hand. This impairment was the result of a childhood accident in Oudezeele, France, where he fell from a tree. The injury was inadequately treated because of the ongoing World War I, leading to his hand not healing correctly. Daniel often recounted this incident with humor and regret, highlighting the lack of medical care available during the war.
Daniel was once engaged to his sister-in-law, Valentine Declercq, who was celebrated as the most beautiful daughter of the Declercq-Devenyn family in Wielsbeke, as noted in Chapter 44.5.5. However, fate intervened, and their engagement did not culminate in marriage, a twist of destiny also detailed in that chapter.
Daniel Lesage passed away when the author was merely twelve years old. Despite the brevity of their time together, Daniel left an indelible mark on the author's life, a sentiment that would resonate for years to come. The author's opportunity to attend university was partly due to Daniel's influence and support. In the absence of living paternal grandparents, Daniel stepped into a grandfatherly role, a mutually cherished relationship. Daniel, having no children or grandchildren of his own, treated his godson, Maurice Declercq (the author's father), as his son.
Daniel's remarkable sense of humor and sharp, calculating mind were among his most notable traits. He often engaged the author

The author's forehead is more that of the Declercq line, but facial characteristics resemble Emile Lesage and Daniel Lesage, as shown here. Daniel's blood relationship with the de Patin family is evident compared to Hortence du Montet, pictured right. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

With Daniel, the author often made tours along the Western Front and to the North of France, like Cassel, Eperlecques (Sperleke), and Oudezeele. A stop at Tyne Cot was also often on the agenda, and they had a strange habit of picnicking on a cloth on the grass during wartime stories. The author, as a child, often played in the bunkers that were still there.*

It's astonishing how fast so many homes have been reconstructed after 1918. The shape and size of the trees and the lack of pavement are still indications of the past devastation. We also observe a sketch made by the German military, we presume, at the beginning of WWI. In addition, we notice ' Stationsstraat' with a view of the boarding school 'Pensionaat ter Bunderen.' The picture dates from the early 1920s.*

The latter shows the atmosphere during the work on the field in 'de Kazakke.' On the back of the picture, Daniel Lesage wrote that it is the family of the brothers Jean, Pierre, Jacques, and Georges with their aunts Mimi and Alice. The father of this family was Mr George, and he is buried at the Sint Amanduskerk in Westrozebeke. We assume it is the same family that was on the hay cart left. - Lid van de godvruchtige genootschappen.

Heb dank, o Heer, voor de gave van deze goede vrouw, en omdat wij haar zolang in ons midden mochten bewaren.

Voor haar man was zij in die vele jaren een stille, maar sterke en trouwe steun. Samen deelden ze de vreugden en het leed van deze wereld, en ze vonden hun geluk in wederzijdse liefde en hulp.

Haar leven was een sprekend voorbeeld van diep geloof en vast betrouwen op Gods voorzienigheid. Zij leerde te bidden in nood, te danken bij vreugde, te aanvaarden uit Gods hand in wel en wee. Kracht voor die levensopdracht vond zij in het dagelijks gebed. Om dit schone leven wacht haar de beloning die de Heer heeft toegezegd aan zijn trouwe dienaren.

Beste ECHTGENOOT, FAMILIELEDEN, KENNISSEN en VRIENDEN, dank voor uw goedheid en geduld, voor uw genegenheid en dienstbaarheid. Blijft mij voort in uw gebeden gedenken. Gaat gelovig en met vertrouwen verder op de weg van dit leven.

Figure 64.213: As Daniel Lesage entered the twilight of his life, residing alone on his cherished farm following his wife's passing, a young photographer happened upon his doorstep. Captivated by her charm, Daniel agreed to her request for a photograph, a moment soon forgotten amidst the solitude of his days. In time, Daniel relocated to a home for older people. Amidst his regular visits to the familiar bakery on Roeselarestraat, near the intersection with Oude Molenstraat, he encountered a heartwarming surprise. With a delighted smile, the baker presented him with a photograph left by the photographer, who had been unable to track him down. This photograph, a splendid portrayal of Daniel, became a cherished memento in his room at the elderly home. The image resonated deeply with him, capturing the essence of his being: the pride of a dedicated farmer, the resilience he found after his wife's death, and the glimmer of hope rekindled by the charming young woman who had seen him in a new light. His eyes sparkled with a vitality that belied his years, and even his left hand, visibly swollen from a childhood injury sustained during WWI in Oudezeele, told a story of perseverance. This hand, long impaired, had never deterred him from his laborious life on the farm. When Daniel eventually moved in with his godson, Maurice Declercq, in Deerlijk, the photograph accompanied him, a constant reminder of his journey. It was more than an image; it was a testament to his enduring spirit, capturing the complex tapestry of his life, marked by hardship, resilience, and an unyielding connection to his past. MyHeritage® colorized this photo. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

He had some moments of joy there, but overall, it was a painful period. He did not belong there. On the right, we see him dancing during a party organized by Dumortier Nutten, a Belgian champion accordion player. A Grey African parrot (Psittacus erithacus) is in the back (the cage is visible), probably descending from a Congolese bird. The bird belonged to a particular 'Michel,' and always shouted 'Michel, Michel, Michel...!!' As a child, the author thought the bird was calling its owner but later realized he had copied that man's wife's voice and phrases. When his wife died, he moved to the elderly home and took the parrot with him - an exact copy of his wife's voice. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

After his wife's death, he liked to stay in touch with everyone and had New Year's wishes pre-printed to make it easier to bless everyone and receive a message back. In the middle, we can see that Daniel liked riddles. This card, for instance, was discovered in 2015, many years after his death, and described the code of his bank safe: 111310. The right-side document is Daniel's public transportation card. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

Figure 64.216: Left, we see Daniel Lesage in 1981 at the Rodenbach ballroom in Ledegem. We don't know which party Daniel visited on this occasion, but the picture tells us that he won a coffee pot at the tombola. The middle photo shows Daniel, who often made walks in Moorslede with a friend in a wheelchair. He was a compassionate man. He called this particular friend 'Den Drogen.' Many older men, usually war veterans, missed an arm or a leg at that time. They were the WWI generation. Right, we see Daniel Lesage, around 1981, regularly visiting the Verkyndere family, of whom Mrs Georgette was immobilized. They lived in a house with number one-two-three, as he used to say. The author once was presented with a rabbit named 'Lino' and a 14-year-old blackbird. Lino became a pet for a couple of years until it was eaten by a gang of dogs that intruded the rabbit house after the author's cousin, a jealous bully, had opened the door in the evening so that the dogs could go in during the night. He was also presented by a blackbird once, totally tame. The blackbird accidentally escaped, and the author still remembers that very beautiful chirp on his way to freedom, very lovely. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

with mathematical and geometrical riddles, stimulating a young mind eager for challenges. His stories of World War I, the regions of Westhoek and Bachten de Kupe, and the various battles there were frequent and vivid. Daniel also took the author on several trips to Eperlecques in Northern France, explaining the manufacturing of the V1 and V2 bombs during World War II. Visits to the Houthulst cemetery, where his brother Hector Lesage was buried, were also a frequent and important part of their excursions.

One of the author's most endearing memories is of their numerous picnics at picturesque spots along the small roads of Westhoek and Northern France. They even picnicked on the grass at the Tyne Cot cemetery in Passchendaele when others scarcely visited it. While this might seem morbid to some, these moments were marked by profound respect and were filled with war-time stories. Daniel's ability to identify every church on the horizon around the Ypres salient with his binoculars was particularly impressive.

Despite not having many personal memories of the war, Daniel's curiosity and ability to recount the stories he had heard from his siblings were profound. His wisdom and storytelling prowess left a lasting impression on the author, who remembered many of these tales and verified them during the research for this book. Daniel's legacy, thus, continued to influence and inspire, embodying the wisdom and warmth of a beloved grandfather.

64.7.12.2 Birth and Early Childhood

Daniël Abel Lesage (Moorslede July 15, 1911 - Deerlijk, April 29, 1988) was the youngest child of Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens. His elder siblings were Cyrille, Martha, Amanda, Gerard, Hector, Maria, Paul, Godelieve and Irma. When WWI began, Daniel was still a petite boy. His elder brother Oscar was five years older, while Irma was six. His birth is shown in Figure 64.193. In July of 1912, the family had moved from Moorslede (Statiestraat 518) to Ledegem, where they owned a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33.

64.7.12.3 His Childhood in Oudezeele during WWI

Following the summer of 1914, his mother relocated Daniel Abel Lesage and most of his siblings to Oudezeele in Northern France. During their stay in Oudezeele throughout the war, they resided with the Secq family at Route des Trois Rois 77, near the village center and the Café des Trois Rois. Their residence was designated as number 49 on the list of homes for refugees in Oudezeele during World War I. The adult members of the household were Eudoxie Lammens and Martha Lesage. At the outset of the war, the eldest son, Cyrille, served in the military, while other sons, Gerard and Hector, joined the ranks during the conflict. Each individual is described in detail in separate chapters of this work.

During his youth in Oudezeele, Daniel suffered a significant injury when he fell from a tree and broke his wrist. Due to the wartime conditions, the injury was never properly treated, resulting in a lifelong disadvantage. Figures 64.194 and 45.91 on page 846 illustrate moments from his time in Oudezeele and his later visits.

Daniel cherished the simple joys of life, such as picnicking at the war cemetery of Passchendaele, depicted in Figure 64.195, or stopping along the road during trips to Northern France. One of his favorite war heroes, whose tales he often recounted, was Georges Guynemer, shown in Figure 64.196. Born in Paris on December 24, 1894, Guynemer held a special place in Daniel's stories. His statue in Poelkapelle is also featured in Figure 64.196.

The significance of Guynemer to the Lesage family can be understood in the context of their residence in Northern France during the war.

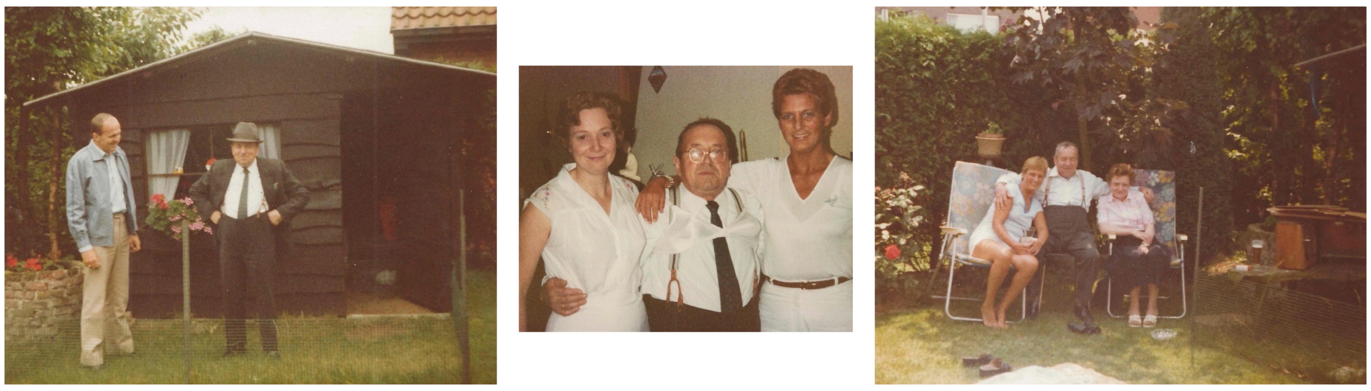

Figure 64.217: *In the middle photo, taken in 1982, Daniel mimics the Mother Superior of the elderly home where he temporarily resided, whom he detested. The picture was taken during a visit to Jeanette Verbrugghe in Deerlijk, with Nelly Maria Vangheluwe on the right. Daniel, known for his humor and calculated nature typical of farmers, is also seen in the right photo at Saint Louis Deerlijk, flanked by Nelly Maria Vangheluwe (the author's mother) and Nelly Devarreware, who may have been his lover. Despite the lack of proof, they were very close, and the author often visited Nelly Devarreware with his father after Daniel's death. Lonely and heavy-smoking, Nelly joined family trips discreetly to avoid jealousy from the Mother Superior, who overcharged Daniel for his stay. The constant struggles with the nuns contributed to his decision to move in with his godson. The left photo, taken in 1981, shows Daniel Lesage in Deerlijk, posing in front of a garden house built by the author and his father, reflecting his years as a rabbit farmer and his willingness to share his expertise. Wij danken God voor deze eenvoudige, goede en gedienstige man. Gesproten en getogen « op den buiten », leefde hij intens mee met de natuur, het weer en de seizoenen. Vele jaren heeft hij zijn beste krachten gewijd aan de land- en tuinbouw en met genoegen de groeikracht van zaad en plant gadegeslagen. Diep gelovig als hij was bracht hij het leven op deze wereld in betrekking met God zijn Schepper om Hem lof en dank te zeggen.

Toen zijn geliefde echtgenote hem ontviel, voelde hij zich meer dan ooit eenzaam. Hij nam intrek in het Rusthuis en was algauw de vriend van vele bejaarden. Zijn gedienstigheid kwam er goed te pas. Elke dag was Daniël de boodschapper om bij te halen. Onderweg was er wel gelegenheid voor een babbeltje met een kennis. Aan zijn neef Maurice maakte hij echter zijn verlangen bekend — zo mogelijk — bij hem in te wonen. Het werden menige gelukkige maanden. Het einde kwam enigszins onverwacht.

Maurice, mijn petekind, jij waart voor mij een echte vader. Niets was je te veel gevraagd, je stond steeds aan mijn zijde, in soms moeilijke omstandigheden. Mijn hartelijke dank voor uw goede zorgen en tedere toewijding gedurende de korte tijdspanne dat ik bij jou mocht verblijven.

Dierbare familieleden, kennissen en geburen, steeds hebben we elkander oprechte vriendschap en hartelijke genegenheid toegedragen. Dank voor uw minzaamheid, dank voor uw belangstelling, dank vooral voor uw bezoeken. Graag had ik nog enkele jaren onder u vertoefd, de Heer heeft het anders beslist. Tot weerzien in het hiernamaals.

Gedenk in uw vroom gebed de ziel

Mevrouw Maria-Elisa VANNEVELE
Weduwe van
Heer Hendrik LIEVENS
geboren te Moorslede de 10 augustus 1866 en godvruchtig overleden te Damme (Brugge) de 24 september 1961.
voorzien van de laatste H. Sacramenten en de Pauselijke Zegen.
Zij was lid van alle godvruchtige genootschappen

Een schoon en rijkgevuld leven van bijna een hele eeuw, wat een erekroon ! De goede God is de ziel van het achtbaar oudje komen halen voor het eeuwig feest in de hemel, als beloning voor en als bekroning van bijna honderd jaren trouwen dienst.

Haar leven was een leven van liefde voor O. L. Heer. Dat had zij als kind begrepen, als jonge moeder aan haar kinderen geleerd, als bejaarde vrouw blijven tonen aan haar vele kleinkinderen door woord en daad. Innerlijk rijk was haar leven, met een diep en vast geloof; met een onvermoeibare werkkracht, bezaaid met beproevingen en gesteund door veel gebed.

Haar leven was een liefdevolle toewijding aan hen die O. L. Heer haar gaf; de steun en de kracht van haar man, de goede moeder en opvoedster van hare kinderen, onder dewelke zij liefdevol een dochter afstond in de dienst van O. L. Heer.

Die toegewijde moeder leefde dan ook als een geliefde koningin te midden van liefdevolle en zorgende kinderen en kleinkinderen, die zo gaarne naar Damme kwamen, naar moeder en grootmoeder, die haar laatste jaren doorbracht onder de goede en liefdevolle zorgen van haar dochter E. Z. Thérésia en haar medezusters. In de hemel zal ze nu ook de steun en de voorspreekster zijn voor haar talrijk nageslacht.

Dierbare Kinderen en Kleinkinderen, Zuster en Schoonzuster, ik zegen U dankbaar voor Uw goedheid en zorgen, vooral U, bij wie ik mijn laatste jaren doorbracht. Ook U, Eerwaarde Zusters, mijn beste dank voor de vele liefdevolle zorgen. Vaartwel en bidt voor mij.

Hart van Jezus, ik heb betrouwen op U. (300 d. afl.)

Goede God, ik dank U :

- om al het goede en schone dat gij mij in mijn leven gegeven hebt ;
- omdat ik het werk van de Heer Jezus mocht voortzetten onder de mensen «zieken genezen» ;
- omdat ik troost of vreugde mocht brengen in vele gezinnen ;
- om de verantwoordelijkheid die Gij mij toevertrouwd hebt, en die ik naar best vermogen, al was het niet volmaakt, getracht heb te dragen ;
- om de kracht en steun die Gij mij geschonken hebt in mijn zware familiale kruisen ;
- omdat ik mocht bidden tot U, als ik mij machteloos voelde ;
- om de genegenheid en dankbaarheid die ik van vele mensen mocht ervaren ;
- om mijn hoge ouderdom, en de tijd die Gij mij gegeven hebt, om de eeuwige ontmoeting met U voor te bereiden ;
- om de hulp en troost in mijn laatste levensjaren, vanwege mijn collega's, de zuster en het personeel, van de H. Hartkliniek.

Ook vraag ik om vergeving aan U Heer, en aan alle mensen, om mijn tekortkomingen door mijn menselijke beperktheid.
Dierbare familieleden, vrienden en kennissen, treurt niet, maar gunt mij het laatste dat gij mij geven kunt : «een eenvoudig gebed».
Dank u.

HEER JEZUS MIJN
LAAT IN RUST EN VREDE ZIJN
DE ZIEL VAN

Heer GEORGES BOSTYN

Burgemeester van de gemeente Moorslede

Echtgenoot van

Mevrouw JULIA BOSTYN

geboren te Moorslede, de 18 november 1902, en er schielijk overleden de 17 januari 1960, voorzien van het H. Oliesel.

Hij was Oud-Strijder 1940-1945.

Vereremerkt met verschillende Eretekens.
Lid van al de godvruchtige genootschappen.

R. I. P.

Hij bestuurde zijn volk met wijs beleid, verhovaardigde zich niet, omdat hij aan het hoofd van anderen gesteld werd; maar was toegankelijk, minzaam en gedienstig voor iedereen. Ook werd hij algemeen geacht. Door God en de mensen bemind, zal zijn gedachtenis in zegening blijven.

Toen de oorlog 40-45 uitbrak, schouderde hij het geweer en vol vaderlandsliefde volbracht hij trouw zijn soldatenplicht. Het was dan ook, van hart tot hart, dat hij, op de 11 novembervieringen, menig oudstrijder het eremerk op de borst mocht aanspelden.

Hij was ook een goede en trouwe echtgenoot. Om haar 't gemis aan kinderliefde te vergelden, wist hij zijn tedere wederhelft door verdubbelde genegenheid en grage hulpvaardigheid veel huiselijk genoegen te verschaffen. Hij bewerkte met en voor haar de tuin; hielp haar in de kweek van haar hoenders en kleinvee - haar liefhebberij - en bracht haar, met stralend gezicht en rechtmatige fierheid, de buit van zijn geliefde jachtpartijen. Dat werd dan een fijn bereid maal, samen of in vriendenkring gezellig verorberd.

Helaas, dit zo vreedzaam huiselijk geluk werd de laatste twee jaren heimelijk gestoord door 'n slepende kwaal. Spijts de toewijding van wijze dokters en de liefelijke zorgen van zijn echtgenote, nam de kwaal plots een kwade wending, en zie... een crisis... en daar... de Engel des Doods ontrukte de goede man aan de tedere liefde van zijn diepbedroefde echtgenote.

O diep geheim van Leven en Dood! Hier past alleen de klacht van Jezus in 't Hofken: Vader, niet mijn wil, maar de Uwe geschiede!

Achtbare medeburgers, gij weet hoe kameraadschappelijk ik in uw midden geleefd heb, niets verzuimende wat U kon voordelig zijn. Mocht ik nu deelachtig blijven in uw godvruchtige gebeden, gelijk ik beloof U bij den Heer indachtig te zijn.

Teergeliefde Echtgenote, we hebben lief en leed gedeeld. Dank om uw genegenheid en tedere zorgen. Van lichaam gescheiden, blijven we in geest en liefde verenigd. Tot blij weerzien in de Hemel! God zegene en beware U!

Dierbare Schoonbroeders, Schoonzusters, Kozijns en Nichten, gedenk mijner in Uw gebeden, gij vooral Zeer Eerwaarde Heren Kozijns en Eerwaarde Zusters Nichten.

Dank ook aan de Zusters van het Wit-Gele Kruis.

TOT VROOM AANDENKEN VAN

Eerwaarde Zuster Ida-Maria van Jezus

Franciskanes

(in de wereld Juffrouw Ida-Maria-Augustina IWEINS)

Gods kind geworden door 't H. Doopsel te Zonnebeke op 28 februari 1876, zachtjes in de Heer ontslapen te Roeselare op 20 februari 1962, gesterkt door de Genademiddelen van onze Moeder de H. Kerk.

Moeder Ida is naar de hemel.

Zo iemand mijn volgeling wil zijn, dan moet hij zichzelf verloochenen, zijn kruis opnemen en Mij volgen, want wie zijn leven wil redden zal het verliezen; maar wie zijn leven verliest om Mij en om het evangelie, zal het redden. (Mc. 8.34-35)

Toen hij een kostbare parel had gevonden, ging hij alles verkopen wat hij bezat, en kocht haar. (Mt. 10.42)

Zo ge volmaakt wilt zijn, ga dan verkopen wat ge bezit, geef het aan de armen, en ge zult een schat in de hemel bezitten. Kom dan en volg mij. (Mt. 19.21)

Al wie zijn huis, broers of zusters, vader of moeder, vrouw of kinderen of akkers verlaat om mijn Naam, hij zal het honderdvoud ontvangen en het eeuwige leven verwerven. (Mt. 19.29)

Neemt niets mee op weg: geen stok, geen reiszak, geen brood en geen geld, zelfs geen tweede onderkleed moogt gij hebben. (Lc. 9.3)

Verkoopt uw bezittingen en geeft er aalmoezen van. Maakt u beurzen die niet slijten, een onuitputtelijke schat in de hemel. (Lc. 12.33)

Wie de wil van God volbrengt, hij is mijn broeder en zuster en moeder. (Mc. 3.35)

Wie mij belijdt voor de mensen zal ook Ik voor mijn Vader belijden, die in de hemelen is. (Mt. 10.32)

Wie zich vernederen zal als dit kind, zal de grootste zijn in het rijk der hemelen, en wie zulk een kind opneemt in mijn Naam, neemt Mij op. (Mt. 18.4-5)

Wat gij voor één van mijn geringste broeders hebt gedaan, dat hebt gij voor Mij gedaan. (Mt. 25.40)

Wie slechts een beker koud water te drinken geeft aan één dezer kleinen, omdat hij een leerling is, voorwaar ik zeg u: hem zal zijn loon niet ontgaan. (Mt. 10.42)

Met de maat waarmee gij meet, zal u worden toegemeten, met een toemaat bovendien. (Mc. 4.24)

Wie het koninkrijk Gods niet aanneemt als een kind, zal er niet ingaan. (Lc. 18.17)

Wie mijn vlees eet en mijn bloed drinkt heeft het eeuwige leven en Ik zal hem op de jongste dag doen verrijzen. (Jo. 6.54)

Zoals de Vader, die leeft, Mij heeft gezonden en Ik leef door de Vader, zo zal hij, die Mij eet, leven door Mij. (Jo. 6.57)

Wie vraagt, ontvangt; wie zoekt, vindt; wie klopt, hem doet men open. (Lc. 9.10)

Slechts één ding is noodzakelijk: Maria heeft het beste deel gekozen, dat haar niet zal ontnomen worden. (Lc. 10.42)

Vaarwel aan mijn familie, aan al mijn beschermelingen, vooral mijn priester-missionaris. Gedenkt mij in uw gebeden.

Dank aan alle weldoeners.

Dank vooral aan wie mijn levenswerk overnamen.

Dank aan allen die mij verzorgden en voor mij bidden.

Mijn goede vrouw, niemand beter dan God en wij samen weten beter hoe schoon en hoe sterk onze trouwe liefde was gegroeid! Er zijn geen woorden genoeg om U te danken voor die ontelbare nachten en dagen vol onverpoosde toewijding en liefde.

Mijn dierbare kinderen, schoonzonen, schoondochters en kleinkinderen, ik heb geprobeerd U allen het beste te geven: een diepchristelijk geloof en een grote naastenliefde! Het was steeds mijn grote vreugde deze schone levenswaarden bij U te zien groeien! Ik dank U allen voor uw grote wederliefde! Blijf de steun van moeder! God zegene en beware U en uw prachtige gezinnen! Van uit de hemel blijf ik voor U allen uw ,, vader ''!

Beste familieleden, ik dank U allen voor uw grote goedheid en medevoelen! Moge de band van onze schone, grote familie steeds samengehouden blijven door de liefde die Christus ons geleerd heeft! Aan al de mensen van mijn schoon en dierbaar Langemark, met oprechte liefde heb ik voor U allen zonder onderscheid steeds gedaan wat ik kon! Ik dank God dat ik met U allen zo aangenaam mocht samenleven! Vaarwel en leef schoon zoals de Heer Christus het ons allen heeft voorgedaan! Moge de goede God Langemark zegenen en behoeden!

Mijn beste dank ook voor de dokters en het verplegend personeel, die mij met hun beste zorgen hebben omringd en mijn lijden hebben verzacht!

Tenslotte een heel bijzonder dankwoord aan al mijn collega's, schepenen en gemeenteraadsleden, met wie ik zo goed mocht samenwerken voor het welzijn en de vreugde van iedereen hier in Langemark. Mijn laatste wens en mijn diepste verlangen is: blijf verder ijveren opdat Langemark de schone, goede gemeente zou blijven, waar het goed is om te leven!

Mevrouw Marcella DELTOUR - DESIMPEL, kinderen en kleinkinderen, aan een voorbeeldig christen, een goede man,

DE HEER

GERARD, JULES DELTOUR

echtgenoot van mevrouw MARCELLA DESIMPEL

Hij werd geboren te Langemark op 29 januari 1913 en vol vertrouwen tot zijn Schepper en Heer teruggekeerd op 10 september 1974, gesterkt en getroost door het Heilig Sakrament der Zieken.

BURGEMEESTER VAN DE GEMEENTE LANGEMARK
Voorzitter van de Boerenbond, afdeling Langemark.
Beheerder van de Zuivelindustrie Inco S.V.
Bestuurslid van de Boerenbond, Arrondissement Ieper.
Oudstrijder 1940 - 1945.
Lid van de Parochieraad en van het Broederschap van het H. Hart.

,, Gij zult de Heer uw God beminnen met heel uw hart, met heel uw ziel en heel uw verstand. - Gij zult uw naaste beminnen als u zelf! ''

God beminnen en de mensen dienen! dit is de boodschap van de Heer; dit is ook het testament van de dierbare overledene.

Mensenwoorden zijn zo gebrekkig en ontoereikend en een gedachtenisprentje is zo beperkt om dit schone mensenleven te benaderen...!

Voor deze goede mens was de zomer nog niet ten einde... Vol vertrouwen is hij heengegaan naar het Beloofde Land, waar de zomerzon nooit ondergaat, bij de Heer van alle leven. Voor ons, mensen hier op aarde, is dit afscheid hard en pijnlijk; het is zo menselijk dat wij wenen...; maar doorheen onze tranen mogen wij het vermoeide hoofd oprichten en hoopvol kijken naar het kruis van Christus, die de dood voor goed overwon! Ons geloof schenkt ons, christenen, die unieke zekerheid dat vader leeft, voor altijd, eeuwig, gelukkig!

Als een late zomernevel hangt over ons allen een diepe stilte... En in deze gewijde stilte is de eerbied, de bewondering en de dankbaarheid voor vader werkelijk tastbaar en voelbaar; voor de ogen van onze geest en ons hart tekent zich op het scherm van onze herinnering een beeld af... een levend beeld, waaronder geen schoner woord kan geschreven worden dan... ,, vader ''! Dàt woord zegt eigenlijk alles! Vader, de trouwe echtgenoot, de wijze man, betrouwbaar en stevig, de eerlijke mens, die met de grootste liefde werkte en leefde voor zijn prachtig gezin en voor zijn dierbaar Langemark! Maar van al de parels, die met hun stille glans de rijke kroon van vader sieren, zijn de parels van zijn eenvoud en van zijn diep, christelijk geloof wel de allerschoonste! Zijn geloof was echt! Een geloof, dat bestand was tegen weer en wind, tegen koude en hitte, tegen de tand des tijds... zijn geloof was noch oud, noch modern... het stond boven dat alles... het was ,, echt ''!

Samen met zijn toegewijde echtgenote heeft hij van de schone hoeve een heerlijk bedrijf gemaakt, maar vooral een warme thuis voor zijn geliefd gezin, een oase van rust en vrede, waar iedereen altijd hartelijk welgekomen was.

Samen met moeder heeft hij een heerlijk gezin opgebouwd tot meerdere eer en glorie van God, tot heilzame zegen van de maatschappij. Vader was vergroeid met het uitgestrekte land en de grote hemel; en in de pracht van de gezonde natuur wist hij zijn God en Schepper te ontdekken en te dienen; maar boven alles verstond hij de grote kunst zijn dierbare kinderen een diep christelijke opvoeding te schenken en hen de christelijke naastenliefde in woord en daad voor te houden. Met recht en reden mocht vader fier zijn over zijn kinderen, de aangetrouwden en vele kleinkinderen! Steeds was hij zo gelukkig en tevreden die grote, schone familie zo liefdevol bij elkaar te zien rond de ouderlijke haard.

Vader was een rustige, stille man, die zo gemoedelijk met iedereen kon omgaan; hij was een mensenkenner, boordevol goedheid voor iedereen; hij kon steeds op het gepaste moment het gepaste woord spreken; hij was de betrouwbare man van vrede en verzoening; met grote liefde leefde hij voor zijn dierbaar Langemark, om er steeds een gemeente van te maken, waar het voor iedereen goed en schoon is om te wonen. Hij was een ,, vader '' voor allen, en door allen gewaardeerd en diepbemind. Iedereen mocht altijd aankloppen aan de deur van zijn huis, en van zijn hart.

Toen de langdurige ziekte zijn lichaam kwamen ondermijnen, heeft hij met bewonderenswaardige moed alle ongemakken zonder klagen gedragen; ja, met de glimlach en in volle overgave aan Gods wil was hij dankbaar voor alle zorgen en toewijding en voor het schone mensenleven, dat de Heer hem gegeven heeft.

De herinnering aan deze goede mens zal niet in de mist van de geschiedenis vervagen, doch zal levend blijven leven in het dankbaar hart van alle Langemarknaren.

Tot de Heer van alle leven teruggekeerd op 30 mei 1971, gesterkt door de heilige zalving der zieken. Hij werd geboren te Langemark op 21 oktober 1907.

BURGEMEESTER van de gemeente Langemark.

Lid van alle kerkelijke genootschappen - Voorzitter van de Koninklijke muziekmaatschappij St.-Cecilia - Voorzitter van de Bond der Grote en Jonge Gezinnen - Lid van de Kerkraad - Kernlid van Strada - Bestuurslid van de afdeling van het Rode Kruis - Afgevaardigde van de gemeente bij de C.O.O. - Afgevaardigde van de gemeente bij de n.v. Inelgas - Lid van de Werkrechtersraad.

Vereerd met het gulden kruis van de heilige Donatianus en Das Verdienstkreuz am Bande des Verdienstordens der Bundesrepublik Deutschland.

„En de Heer sprak : een nieuw gebod geef ik u : bemin elkaar, zoals ik u bemind heb, zo ook moet gij elkaar beminnen. Hierdoor zal iedereen weten, dat gij mijn leerlingen zijt, indien gij elkaar liefhebt !''

Naar dit allesomvattende woord van de Heer, heeft deze man gans zijn leven geleefd ! in dienende liefde ! in alle eenvoud en oprechtheid God en alle mensen werkelijk gaarne gezien !

Dit is het heerlijke testament, het blijvende erfdeel, dat deze schone mens aan iedereen van ons aanbiedt, als een onvergankelijke herinnering, als de edelste opdracht voor allen die zijn werk voortzetten.

Woorden zijn zo gebrekkig om de rijkdom van dit mensenleven te tekenen...

Op die zondagse meimorgen viel alle leven stil... de wereld en de tijd stonden stil in het gezin en de familie ; een stilte kwam over gans de gemeente waar niemand kon geloven dat het waar was...

Een goede vader en een vriend van allen is heengegaan ; waar vader was, daar was ook de volle goedheid van het schoonste mensenleven ; de grote eenvoud van deze dieprijke mens was als het echte, stille goud, waarin de zuivere edelstenen van rechtvaardigheid en warme goedheid, zacht en harmonisch verwerkt zijn.

In de voetstappen van de Heer zelf ging deze mens rond al weldoende ! Hij zocht geen sympathie, en toch had hij de sympathie van allen zonder onderscheid ; hij kende de grote levenskunst te zwijgen en te luisteren naar het hart van iedereen ; zijn woorden van wijsheid getuigden van zeer diepe mensenkennis en kwamen recht uit een hart dat klopte en leefde voor de anderen, voor iedereen ! Zijn liefdevolle waardering voor alle mensen dwingt ons aller eerbied en bewondering af ; van deze mens kan men in alle ernst getuigen : hij had niets anders dan vrienden !

Van de stille aanwezigheid van deze eenvoudige mens ging een grote kracht uit ; hij is een van die zeldzamen die blijven voortleven in het dankbaar hart van al zijn medemensen. Wij mogen de Heer danken dat zulk een man onder ons geleefd heeft !

Zijn goedheid kende slechts de grenzen van dit leven ! De linkerhand moet niet weten wat de rechterhand geeft... ! Deze spreuk was zijn leven zelf ; in alle stilte en ongeweten heeft hij geld, hart en leven blijmoedig geschonken aan allen die het nodig hadden ; altijd en voor iedereen gereed, kon deze man niets weigeren ! Hij kon nooit iemand pijn doen, omdat hij slechts leefde om anderen gelukkig te maken.

Deze man heeft hard en veel gewerkt opdat iedereen het goed zou hebben ! In de eerste plaats voor zijn diepbeminde vrouw en zijn prachtig gezin ! Vader was de stille zon in huis, waarbij iedereen het licht der waarheid en de warmte van de liefde vond ; deze zon is nu ondergegaan, maar de klaarheid en de deugddoende warmte blijven !

Deze man heeft geleefd en gewerkt voor alle mensen van zijn dierbare gemeente ! Hij was de burgemeester en de vader van en voor allen !

Deze schone man wordt nooit een herinnering... want hij blijft voortleven in het dankbaar hart van allen !

Mijn goede en liefdevolle vrouw, in grote liefde mochten wij samen ons leven en ons heerlijk gezin schoon opbouwen ! Ons hart voelt beter wat woorden niet kunnen zeggen ! Wij waren en blijven alles voor mekaar ! Gij alleen weet best hoezeer ik u in stilte bemin en dank voor gans het leven ! Onze goede en dankbare kinderen zullen voor u een blijvende bron van vrede en diep geluk zijn !

Dierbare kinderen, ik ben blij en gelukkig om uw geluk, om uw leven van wederliefde en echte waardering ; wij weten hoe wij elkaar zonder grote woorden onzeglijk echt beminnen ! Blijf allen verder de diepe vreugde van onze goede moeder ! Moge God u allen, uw vrouw, mijn kleinkind, uw verloofden en allen die u dierbaar zijn, werkelijk zegenen en bewaren !

Mijn trouwe, schone familie, ik dank u allen voor uw grote goedheid en warme genegenheid ; onze liefdevolle ontmoetingen maakten ons leven aangenaam en heerlijk !

Aan alle mensen van mijn dierbaar Langemark : ik dank de Heer dat ik met u allen mocht samenleven ! Met liefde heb ik mijn leven aan u gewijd : vaarwel en leef schoon en gelukkig, naar het voorbeeld van liefde die de Heer ons allen gegeven heeft.

Een bijzonder woord van dank aan al mijn collega's, schepenen en gemeenteraadsleden, waarmee ik mocht samenwerken voor het welzijn en de vreugde van iedereen hier in Langemark. Mijn laatste wens en mijn vaste hoop : blijf verder ijvereen opdat Langemark de schone gemeente zou blijven waar het goed is om te leven !

Om de rechtzinnige blijken van kristelijke deelneming danken U van harte :

De families GHEERAERT-VERMEERSCH,

† Barmhartige Jezus, schenk de eeuwige rust aan de ziel van
HEER ALIDOR-LEO DENYS
weduwnaar van
Vrouw MARIE GRYMONPON,
echtgenoot van
Vrouw MARTHA VANDENBUSSCHE, RUSTEND ONDERWIJZER, vereerd met het Burgerlijk Eereteeken van 1e klas, de Medaille van 1e klas en de Herinneringsmedaille, geboren te Moorslede den 29 Mei 1883
en er godvruchtig overleden den 16 Mei 1943, bediend met het H. Oliesel.

ZOO zijn leven was, zoo is zijn dood: stil, verborgen en nederig.

MET een geduld en toewijding die zij alléén kennen die met hem omgingen, heeft deze man zijn beste levenskrachten gewijd aan de heerlijke taak die de Heer hem had opgedragen: de opvoeding der jeugd. Jaren lang heeft hij in alle stilte het goede zaad uitgestrooid in de zielen der hem toevertrouwde kinderen. " Daarom zal hij het Rijk der glorie ontvangen en een heerlijke kroon uit Gods hand". (WIJSH. 5).

EN wijl hij zelf onderwees, ging hij ter school bij den Goddelijken Meester, uit wiens Hart hij kracht putte om met ziel-louterende edelmoedigheid den last te dragen van zijn ambt en de beproevingen die den Heer hem overzond. Zoo was, ook toen hij met ruste ging, heel zijn levenswijze de beleving van wat hij zelf had onderwezen.

DAAROM zal de Heer hem verheerlijken, want de H. Schrift luidt: " Die er velen zullen onderwezen hebben in de wegen der gerechtigheid, zullen blinken als sterren in alle eeuwen ".

MIJN beminde Echtgenoote, zoo haastig is ons geluk voorbij gevlogen... Ik weet dat uw hart van droefheid breekt bij mijn haastig heengaan. Doch ik was bereid. — Zoek troost bij God, bij onze kinderen en in de gedachte dat ik naar den Hemel ga waar ik aan U blijf denken, U beminnen en voor U bidden, opdat God U vergelde voor uwe liefdevolle zorgen. Heb dank.

MIJN geliefde Kinderen, wat valt het mij zwaar U te verlaten — ik was zoo blij om uw geluk — mocht het offer van mijn leven, Gods zegen verwerven over uw leven. Geeft moeder al uwe liefde en al uwen troost en blijft vader in uwe gebeden indachtig. Vaartwel !

MIJN dierbare familieleden, oud-leerlingen en vrienden, bidt voor mij en " waakt, omdat gij niet weet op wat uur uw Heer komen zal". (H. MATTH. 24).

Akten van Geloof, Hoop en Liefde.

geboren te Gullegem op 24 december 1895 en zacht in de Heer ontslapen te Roeselare (H. Hartkliniek) op 22 maart 1974, voorzien van het sakrament van de zieken.

Gesproten uit een aloud geslacht, waar diep geloof en kristelijke overtuiging vaste waarden zijn, zo was ons vader, een waardige afstammeling van de familie.

Geheel zijn leven en al zijn handelingen hebben immer dezelfde stempel gedragen waaruit goedheid, eerlijkheid, rechtvaardigheid en naastenliefde het meest naar voor komen.

De Heer gaf hem veel talenten die hij in dienst van de gemeenschap tot ongewone grote bloei heeft gebracht.

Talenten als echtgenoot — wij kinderen hoorden Papa alleen met lof en eerbied over Mama spreken, nooit of nooit hoorden we hem een minder beschaafd woord uitspreken.

Talenten als huisvader — voor ieder van ons stelde U bij onze eerste communie een speciaal gedicht op voor het communieprentje. Bij ons huwelijk kreeg ieder van ons een typische afscheidsrede en werd de nieuwe dochter of zoon op een eigen manier welkom geheten — attenties als vader die ons altijd zullen bijblijven.

Talenten als Geneesheer — 50 jaar geneesheer te Moorslede, hij kende zijn patiënten en verzorgde hen met de ernst die hem eigen was ; hij bezat de kunde en de moed hen die behandeling te verstrekken die ieders gezondheid en familiale-sociale toestand paste.

Talenten als Burgemeester — Burgervader zijn was voor hem hetzelfde als huisvader zijn ; hij kende plichtsbesef en in al de beslissingen die hij nam droeg hij zijn volle verantwoordelijkheid.

DIERBARE ECHTGENOTE, mijn heengaan doet U lijden, we waren lang te samen en gelukkig, in de herfst van ons leven hadden we elkander zo nodig. Dank, goede Julia, om uw beste zorgen, we blijven te samen in gebed en gedachten, de dood kan ons niet scheiden.

BESTE KINDEREN, ge waart mij allen even lief, neemt een voorbeeld aan mijn leven, wees mijn raadgevingen indachtig, voedt uw kinderen kristelijk op. Bidt alle dagen te samen en houdt van uw zondagmis. Ik blijf U volgen in de hemel.

LIEVE KLEINKINDEREN, in onze oude dag waart ge onze trots en onze voldoening. Wees uw Peter altijd indachtig en blijft uw ouders eren.

Immersed in French culture and news, the family, particularly Eudoxie Lammens and her children, were inspired by French heroes celebrated and honored by the French people. These figures, such as Guynemer, provided hope and inspiration. Guynemer, a celebrated flying ace, was as revered by the French as the Red Baron, Manfred von Richthofen, was by the Germans. His 53 aerial victories marked Guynemer's heroism before he was ultimately shot down near Poelkapelle on September 11, 1917. His body was never recovered, but he was commemorated with a memorial at the Pantheon in Paris. His aerial battles often extended into German-occupied territories as deep as Houthulst and Westrozebeke.

During tours of the Westhoek region in Flanders, Daniel Lesage would invariably pause at the statue of Guynemer in Poelkapelle. Through these moments, he introduced the author to the legendary pilot, sharing stories that reflected both admiration and a deep sense of historical connection. These shared experiences, along with many other cherished memories, underscored the bond between Daniel and the author, imbuing their relationship with the warmth and wisdom characteristic of a beloved grandfather.

64.7.12.4 The Time at Beitem

Following the devastation of World War I, the region where the Lesage family resided in Belgium lay in ruins. Officially, their address remained at Ledegem until September 30, 1921, when they relocated to Beselare, specifically at Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, near the junction with Slangemeersstraat. During this period, Daniel Abel Lesage and his brother Oscar attended Sint Lodewijkschool in Beitem just after the war. Visual records from this era can be found in Figures 64.197 and 64.198.

Beitem, a parish at the intersection of Ledegem, Moorslede, and Rumbeke, served as a strategic schooling location for the Lesage brothers. Given the family's composition of adults and children and with Eudoxie still registered at Oudezeele for several years, the Lesages were likely dispersed across various accommodations, including homes and barracks—a common situation in the post-war era, as many families were rendered homeless.

Paul Lesage remained in Ledegem, while visual documentation of Moorslede post-war is presented in Figures 64.199. Daniel's brother Gerard married Magdalena Meersseman after the war, likely settling in the eastern part of Moorslede, within the Koekuit-Beytem-Ledegem triangle or near Passchendaele. Despite the central family's move to Beselare, where they established a new farm, Daniel and Oscar continued their education at Beitem, possibly residing with Gerard and Magdalena Meersseman in Zilverbergstraat. Being local to the area, Magdalena had familial ties there, with her brother Andre Meersseman living in their parents' home until his death in Koekuit, Moorslede.

Magdalena and Gerard managed a farm in the Koekuit region.

After Gerard's untimely death, leaving no children, it was deemed necessary by Emile Lesage for Daniel to marry Magdalena. Consequently, Daniel ended his engagement with his sister-in-law, Valentine Declercq, as detailed in Chapter 64.7.12.5. By marrying Magdalena, Daniel expanded his wealth by inheriting Gerard's and Magdalena's shares and solidified his familial and economic standing.

Despite their union, Daniel and Magdalena did not have children, partly due to the age difference, as Magdalena was twelve years older than Daniel. Eventually, they relocated to a smaller farm near Roeselaarsestraat and Oude Molenweg in Moorslede. When Daniel's youngest sister, Irma Lesage, married Michel Declercq, she moved to Wielsbeke and later to Deerlijk. In 1941, the birth of Maurice Declercq, to whom Daniel became a godfather, marked a significant turn in Daniel's life. He cherished Maurice, the author's father, as his son.

Maurice spent all his vacations with Daniel and Magdalena in Moorslede, especially after the early death of his mother, Irma Lesage, in 1953.

Daniel's relationship with Maurice exemplified the depth of his familial bonds and his role as a surrogate grandfather to the author. Their shared experiences, enriched by Daniel's stories and wisdom, forged a lasting connection that transcended the boundaries of traditional familial roles, leaving an enduring legacy of love and guidance.

64.7.12.5 His Love Affair with Valentine Declercq

The engagement of Daniel Abel Lesage and Valentine Declercq has left an indelible mark on our family's history, weaving a narrative rich with romance, heartache, and enduring affection. Daniel, depicted in Figure 64.200 from 1931, shared a profound relationship with Valentine, a year his senior. Their love, immortalized in the poetry of Valentine's close friend Gabrielle Demedts, was both passionate and poignant. Unfortunately, the relationship was cut short by the untimely death of Gerard Lesage, which precipitated Daniel's decision, or perhaps coercion, to marry Gerard's widow, Magdalena Meersseman, in 1934. This marriage, widely understood to be arranged and devoid of love, marked a tragic turn for Daniel and Valentine.

Valentine, who remained single for a time, eventually married Maurice Wullaert but passed away in 1939. Maurice Wullaert later married Valentine's sister, Rachelle. The heartbreak and separation between Valentine and Daniel inspired Demedts to pen evocative poems, capturing the depth of their connection and the sorrow of their parting. These poems are detailed in Valentine's Chapter 44.5.5.

The author's personal memories of Daniel, who was like a grandfather to him, reflect a bond forged from familial ties and shared stories and experiences. In 1984, during a visit to Wielsbeke, the author accompanied Daniel to see Gerard Verbrugghe, described in Chapter 77, and Maria Vandenabeele. Daniel's request to visit the Declercq farm, 'Hof van Brussel,' in Reynaertstraat, underscored the place's deep sentimental value for him. It was not merely the historical significance—where his father Emile, his brother Paul, and his sister Irma, the author's grandmother, had resided—but also the poignant memories of his time with Valentine that drew him back.

Daniel's father-like feelings for Maurice Declercq, the author's father, are deeply rooted in this context. Maurice, named after Valentine's later widower Maurice Wullaert, was Daniel's godson—a choice perhaps motivated by a sense of guilt or profound respect. These feelings manifested in the affectionate and grandfatherly manner Daniel displayed towards the author, sharing stories of farming, war, and life's riddles. One such riddle, remembered vividly by the author, was solved with surprising speed, eliciting Daniel's astonishment and admiration. In hindsight, this moment likely brought back memories of Valentine's cleverness, intertwining past and present in love and remembrance.

The relationship between Daniel and Valentine, though ultimately thwarted, continues to resonate through the generations, encapsulated in the poetry of Demedts and the cherished recollections of the author.

Their story, marked by romantic fervor and enduring affection, remains a poignant chapter in the family's legacy.

64.7.12.6 His Marriage with Magdalena Meersseman

Magdalena Maria Meersseman was born in Moorslede on February 3, 1899, as depicted in Figure 64.201. She was the daughter of Aloïs Xavier Meersseman, a farmer born in Oostnieuwkerke on September 21, 1848, and Marie-Pharaïlde Vercruysse, born in Moorslede on July 6, 1860. Aloïs and Marie-Pharaïlde had married in Moorslede on October 3, 1884. Magdalena passed away on October 6, 1976, in Roeselare, while her husband, Daniel Abel Lesage, died in Deerlijk on March 30, 1988.

Aloïs Xavier Meersseman's parents were Pierre Meersseman and Catherine Synaeve, while Marie-Pharaïlde Vercruysse's parents were Pierre Jean Vercruysse and Lucia Vanbiervliet. The familial roots of Magdalena were deeply intertwined with the regions significant to Emile Theophile Lesage, who felt a moral obligation to look after her following Gerard Lesage's death. Consequently, Emile urged Daniel to marry Magdalena, as illustrated in Figures 64.202, 64.203, and 64.204. This union also safeguarded the family's assets, ensuring they were not dissipated to other families—a common practice among farming communities.

Daniel and Magdalena married on May 22, 1934, in Passchendaele and initially resided at Messestraat 4, presumably the farm where Magdalena had lived with Gerard until his passing. Images of Daniel as a newlywed are available in Figures 64.205 and 64.206. The simplicity and hard work typical of farming life marked their life together. They were devoted to their land and each other, embodying the resilient spirit of rural life.

Although the author does not have personal memories of Magdalena, frequent visits to Daniel's childhood home left a lasting impression. The author feels a connection to Magdalena through the stories shared by Daniel and the photographs that adorned his house. One charming anecdote from the author's childhood reflects the warmth and humor that permeated their household. As a tiny child, the author once went silent while crawling on the ground, only to be discovered eating food meant for the cats—a testament to the lively and loving environment Daniel and Magdalena fostered.

Daniel and Magdalena's life together was characterized by mutual respect and affection, not only for each other but also for the author, whom they cherished as if he were their grandchild. Though initially arranged, their marriage blossomed into a partnership that exemplified the quiet dignity and enduring bonds of farming life. Daniel's eventual move to Deerlijk on October 4, 1986, to live with his godson Maurice Declercq underscores the deep familial ties and the enduring legacy of love and care that defined his life with Magdalena.

Despite their devoted partnership, Daniel always harbored a deep pain for the relationship, and he could not continue with Valentine Declercq. Similarly, as a widow, Magdalena perpetually carried the memory of her former husband, Gerard Lesage, in her heart. Daniel and Magdalena were, in many ways, wounded souls who had lost significant love. However, they found solace and warmth in each other, built primarily on mutual respect rather than passionate romance. Though formed under the shadow of past loves and losses, their bond was a testament to their resilience and ability to find comfort and companionship in the face of life's adversities.

64.7.12.7 His godchild Maurice Declercq

Although Daniel Lesage never had any children, his godson Maurice Declercq, the author's father, was like a son to him. His life is found in Chapter 46.

64.7.12.8 His Career as a Farmer

Daniel Lesage dedicated his entire life to farming, a vocation intertwined with cherished memories, as depicted in Figure 64.207. Faced with the reality of remaining childless and Maurice Declercq's decision against relocating to Moorslede to pursue farming, Daniel and Magdalena resolved to scale back their agricultural ambitions. They chose to retreat to their modest farm in Moorslede, as shown in Figures 64.208, 64.209, and 64.210, content with sustaining themselves without further expansion.

Their property portfolio included a 40-are farm at Passchendaele (Messestraat 4), a mere two kilometers from their residence at Oude Molenweg/Roeselaarsestraat in Moorslede. This farm was leased to Delbeecke-Lyncket and subsequently sold to Delbeecke-Derycke from Ledegem on July 18, 1966, under the auspices of notary André Camerlynck.

Maurice Declercq held a deep affection for the land at Messestraat, having spent many of his youthful holidays assisting Daniel with farming activities. He once guided the author to this beloved location, sharing his enduring fondness. The precise address eluded the author for some time, remembered only by general direction once rediscovered through diligent examination of notary records. Even Daniel's wedding book bears the notation Kazakke in pencil, corroborating the notarial documents.

Daniel ultimately sold his 55-acre farm to Vandaele-Vandermersch on September 17, 1980, again facilitated by notary André Camerlynck in Passchendaele. By this time, Daniel had already taken up residence in an elderly home in Moorslede.

64.7.12.9 The Death of his Wife and the Decision to move to the Elderly Home

When Daniel Lesage, the author's granduncle, lost his beloved wife, Magdalena Meersseman, the weight of his grief was overwhelming. The void left by her absence pushed him into a deep depression, leading him to make the heart-wrenching decision to move into a home for older people. It was the 1980s, and the home was located in Moorslede, Flanders—a far cry from the comforting familiarity of his own house.

The elderly home, as depicted in Figures 64.214, was stark and austere, devoid of the warmth and luxuries that one might hope for in such a place. The author, then a child, visited Daniel weekly with his parents, a routine imbued with a sense of duty and affection. They brought along his favorite treat each visit: vanilla pudding accompanied by gingerbread cookies, a recipe likely passed down from Daniel's mother, Eudoxie Lammens. This small gesture of comfort stood in stark contrast to the bleakness of his surroundings.

The home was populated by other older men, many of whom bore the physical and psychological scars of war. The sight of men with amputated limbs was a common one, and the young author initially believed these injuries were simply a part of aging. It was only later that he learned these men were veterans of World War I, each with their own story of loss and survival.

The home echoed with the shouts of nearly deaf residents, their voices raised to communicate, and the air was thick with the persistent smell of tobacco from pipes smoked incessantly.

Daniel's time in the elderly home before Maurice Declercq's intervention was marked by profound loneliness and mistreatment. He was bullied by the nun in charge, forced to pay exorbitant fees, and despite the many residents, he felt isolated. The indignities he suffered were compounded by the psychological toll of his wife's death, making this period the darkest chapter of his life.

Yet, amidst the gloom, there were fleeting moments of respite. Daniel's well-calculated and determined nature, captured in Figures 64.215, allowed him to carve out small pockets of social interaction.

He found solace during parties or when visitors filled the living room, moments when the sterile walls of the institution faded into the background, replaced by the warmth of human connection, as shown in Figures 64.214, 64.216, and 64.217.

The author's weekly visits became a lifeline for Daniel, a reminder that he was still tethered to the world outside the home's confines. The author's memories of these visits are tinged with a deep emotional resonance, a blend of childhood innocence and the dawning awareness of the complexities of adult life and loss. The elderly home in Moorslede remains etched in his memory as a place of stark contrasts: the severe realities of aging and war interwoven with the tender threads of familial love and duty.

64.7.12.10 His Move to Deerlijk

After enduring the harsh conditions of the elderly home, Daniel Lesage's life took a transformative turn when Maurice Declercq, the author's father, extended a lifeline of compassion and familial love. Maurice invited Daniel to live with him in Deerlijk, a gesture that promised a change of residence and a complete renewal of spirit.

The contrast between the two living situations could not have been starker. Where the elderly home in Moorslede was a place of isolation and despair, Maurice's home in Deerlijk was a haven of warmth and vitality. As soon as Daniel moved in, he was enveloped in an atmosphere that was the polar opposite of his previous environment. The oppressive gloom of the elderly home gave way to Maurice's household's bright, inviting ambiance. Here, Daniel found a place to live and a home where he was valued and cared for.

Living with Maurice, Daniel's days were filled with simple yet profound joys that rejuvenated his spirit. He embraced a farmer's lifestyle, immersing himself in the rhythms of rural life. He took great pleasure in helping to look after the neighbor's pigeons, which brought him purpose and companionship. Daniel quickly integrated into the local community, finding like-minded farmers with whom he could chat, share stories, and predict the weather—one of his favorite pastimes.

The author fondly remembers the image of Daniel enjoying his meals, slurping his soup with satisfaction, and sipping 'table beer' during lunch, which he claimed was good for his stomach. His days followed a comforting routine: waking up early, engaging in meaningful daily activities, and retiring early to bed. These habits, rooted in his past, provided a sense of continuity and stability.

Unfortunately, Daniel's health began to decline a few years after moving to Deerlijk. Despite this, his time there was imbued with a sense of peace and fulfillment that had been absent during his years at the elderly home. He relished the opportunity to talk about his past, sharing stories of his time in France, Moorslede, and Beitem. These conversations were not just a means of reminiscing but a way of connecting with those around him, bridging the gap between generations and keeping his memories alive.

Daniel found a sanctuary in Maurice's home where he could live out his final years with dignity and contentment. His presence brought joy and a sense of continuity to the household, as illustrated in Figures 64.217. This period of his life, though short-lived, was a testament to the profound impact of love, family, and the simple pleasures of rural life. Daniel's rescue from the elderly home by Maurice was more than just a physical relocation; it was a rescue of his spirit, allowing him to experience the twilight of his life not in the shadow of his loss but in the light of newfound hope and companionship.

64.7.12.11 His Death

Daniel Lesage had found solace and peace in Maurice's home, but as with all things, his time came to an end. Daniel had developed a fondness for a small siesta after lunch, a brief respite that symbolized his newfound tranquility. One day, after one such nap, he awoke feeling an unusual weakness. With effort, he stumbled to the living room, where he found Maurice, the author's father. In a moment heavy with finality, Daniel managed to utter, "I cannot anymore," before kneeling on the floor and passing away instantly.

The suddenness of his death was a profound shock to all who knew him. Daniel's death registration, announcement, and mortuary card, depicted in Figures 64.218, 64.219, and 64.220, serve as stark reminders of the fleeting nature of life. His passing left a deep void in the household, a silent testament to the irreplaceable presence he had become.

Daniel left behind not material wealth but a legacy of deep sentiments and cherished memories. His foster son and godson, Maurice, received his heartfelt sentiments, as shown in Figure 64.221. This legacy was not measured in tangible assets but in the profound emotional connection and the values imparted—a legacy far more valuable than any material possession.

The author, who had come to see Daniel as a grandfather figure, continues to take full responsibility for Daniel's tomb in Moorslede, as seen in Figure 64.222. The care and respect shown to his final resting place are a testament to the enduring bond they shared.

Months before his passing, Daniel had assured the author that he would support him if he ever chose to become a farmer. Though the author eventually took a different path, finding his calling in academia, the sentiment behind Daniel's promise remains a treasured memory.

Daniel's life and his ultimate departure left an indelible mark on those who loved him. His quiet strength, his simple joys, and his unwavering support provided a foundation upon which the author has built his life. The memories of Daniel's time, his stories of war and resilience, and his caring nature are woven into the fabric of the author's identity. Despite the sorrow of his loss, there is a glimpse of hope in the lasting impact of Daniel's life—a reminder that love and memories can transcend even death.

64.7.12.12 Some Acquaintances

Daniel often spoke of 'Pater Lievens' from Moorslede, although he was not precisely an acquaintance. Constant Lievens was a Jesuit missionary to India, born in Moorslede on April 11, 1856, at Koekuit, the same place where Daniel Lesage lived. Constant was the seventh of eleven children. At eleven, following his mother's death, he left school to work at home, first as a cowkeeper and later as a horse servant. His expertise with horses would later prove invaluable in his missionary work.

Lievens pursued his studies at the Klein Seminarie in Roeselare, where he was in the class of notable individuals, including Albrecht Rodenbach, and was part of what writer Hugo Verriest termed 'The Wonder Class.' In October 1877, he commenced his studies at the 'Groot Seminarie' in Bruges. However, Lievens aspired to become a missionary.

Thus, in October 1878, he joined the Jesuits in Drongen to begin his two-year novitiate. In October 1880, he departed for India, a journey that took six weeks, arriving in Calcutta on December 2. He continued his education in Asansol, and on January 14, 1883, he was ordained to the priesthood by Mgr Goethals in the Cathedral of Calcutta. He began his teaching career at Saint-Francis College.

In 1885, Lievens embarked on his missionary work in Chota-Nagpur, Bengal. By the end of July 1885, he had moved to Torpa to start a new mission. Initially, he converted a few inhabitants to Catholicism. Realizing the locals needed legal assistance against regular oppression, he offered legal advice. To this end, he studied the general and regional laws, as well as the local customs of the Mundas. His efforts soon earned him fame and appreciation as a missionary.

In 1886, Lievens established 26 schools, traveling by horse to visit each one. This endeavor resulted in the conversion of 2000 people shortly thereafter. From 1887 onwards, he managed to convert entire villages, reminiscent of the Portuguese missionaries in the 1500s.

By October 1888, Father Lievens had become the district superior of Ranchi. However, he fell ill and went to Calcutta for a diagnosis, where he was found to have tuberculosis. He then traveled to Darjeeling in the mountains to recuperate. When his health did not improve, he returned to Belgium and embarked on a journey back to Calcutta on September 3, 1892. Unfortunately, his disease had progressed too far by the time he arrived. Constant Lievens died in Leuven on November 7, 1893.

Lievens' impact extended beyond his lifetime. His methods of combining education, legal assistance, and religious conversion set a new standard for missionary work in India. His approach to understanding and integrating local customs and laws into his mission work garnered significant respect and led to substantial, sustainable conversions. The schools he established played a critical role in the education and upliftment of the Indigenous populations, laying the groundwork for future missionary efforts in the region.

Some acquaintances of Daniel are shown in Figures 64.223, 64.224, 64.225, 64.226, 64.227, 64.228, 64.229, 64.230, 64.231, 64.232 and 64.233.

64.7.12.13 Some Memorabilia

Daniel Lesage left numerous documents from his archive. Some were old shares, no longer of any value, but that he did not destroy. He also left many pictures, notes, and other memorabilia, some appearing throughout this book. Illustrations are shown in Figure 64.234.

64.8 Irma Helena Lesage & Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq

64.8.1 Irma Helena Lesage

She was born in 1905 at Moorslede, Belgium, the daughter of Emile Theophile Lesage (DP12V03DW02L01) and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens. She married Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC18) and died in 1953 in Kortrijk, Belgium.

Irma Helena Lesage (DP12V03DW02L02) is primarily described in Chapter 45.2 as the wife of Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq and the author's grandmother. She is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2 as the great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 68 in the 't Kint ancestry; and Chapter 71 as the granddaughter of Clemens Lammens and Natalia Juliana Decaestecker.

64.8.2 Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15)

He was born in 1906 in Wielsbeke, Belgium, as the son of Ernest Constant Declercq and Marie Elody Devenyn. He died in 1963 in Deerlijk, Belgium. Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) is primarily described in Chapter 45 as a descendant of the Desclergues and grandfather of the author. He is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 65, as the husband of Irma Helena Lesage and great-great-great-great-great-grandson-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1, as great-great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2, as the husband of Irma Lesage and great-great-great-great-grandson-in-law of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 68, in the 't Kint ancestry; and Chapter 71, as grandson-in-law of Clemens Lammens.

64.8.3 Their Marriage

Their wedding was in 1932 at Beselare, Belgium, and is shown in Chapter 45.3.

64.9 Maurice Alois Declercq (DC16) & Nelly Maria Vangheluwe

64.9.1 Maurice Alois Declercq (DC16)

Maurice Alois Declercq (DC16) is the son of Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) and Irma Helena Lesage. He is primarily described in Chapter 46 as a descendant of the Desclergues and father of the author. He is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 65, as great-great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1, as great-great-great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2, as a great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Marie Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67, as the son-in-law of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68, as a descendant of 't Kint; Chapter 69, as great-grandson-in-law of Marie Nathalie Surmont; and Chapter 71, as the great-grandson of Clemens Lammens.

64.9.2 Nelly Maria Vangheluwe

Nelly Maria Vangheluwe is primarily described in Part X as the daughter of René Vangheluwe, Anna Den Dauw, and the author's mother. She is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 65, as great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12; Chapter 66.1, as great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2, as a great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Marie Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67, as the daughter of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68 a descendant-in-law of ' t Kint; Chapter 69, as the great-granddaughter of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71, as great-granddaughter-in-law of Clemens Lammens; and in Chapter 72, the maternal (mt-DNA) ancestry line, as the mother of the author.

64.10 Nico Felicien Declercq (DC17) & Shirani Olupathage de Silva

64.10.1 Nico Felicien Declercq (DC17)

Nico Felicien Declercq (DC17) is the author of this book, is a grandson of Irma Helena Lesage and Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq, and is primarily described in Chapter 47, as a descendant of the Desclergues.

He is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 65, as great-great-great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1, as great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2, as a great-great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67, as the grandson of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68, as a descendant of 't Kint; Chapter 69 as the great-great-grandson of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71 as the great-great-grandson of Clemens Lammens; and in Chapter 72, the maternal (mt-DNA) ancestry line of the author.

Furthermore, he is referred to in Part XII as the husband of Shirani Oluphathage de Silva.

64.10.2 Shirani Olupathage de Silva

Shirani Olupathage de Silva is first described in Chapter 47.3, as the author's wife.
She is equally referred to, in much detail, in Part XII, and also in the following chapters: in Chapter 65, as great-great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1, as great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2, as a great-great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 67, as granddaughter-in-law of Anna Den Dauw; Chapter 68, as a descendant-in-law of ' t Kint; Chapter 69, as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Marie Nathalie Surmont; Chapter 71, and as great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Clemens Lammens.

Chapter 65

Ancestry line de Patin

65.1 Introduction

This concerns a bloodline with roots in Cambrai and later Geluwe, Ypres, and Langemark. Ypres was one of the most beautiful towns in Belgium until WWI, when it was destroyed. Remarkably, the cemetery along Zonnebeekseweg, not far from the Menin gate, remained intact. The tomb in Figure 65.1 is that of Vicomte de Patin and was constructed in 1796. Based on the data obtained from Heemkring Flambertus in Vlamertinge[1], we assume that the tomb was constructed for Joseph de Patin (DP12by1y2y1) who died in 1792 and was married to Catherine Thérèse Françoise de Ghelcke. His family is described in Chapter 70.4. The de Patin family had old roots in Cambrai and has always been close to and cared a lot about people from all classes of society around them. The author appreciates this attitude very much. A description in the literature is shown in Figure 65.2. Just like the Desclergues, the de Patin family also owned mills. In their case, it concerned windmills, one of which is shown in Figure 65.3.

It is believed that the early pronunciation of Patin was the pronunciation still found in Flemish, which is 'pat-yn' with '-yn' as in 'Evelyn.' Therefore, the generally accepted assumption that the English name Patton originated from the French name Patin and arrived on the English Isles during the reign of Normandy[2] and later came to the United States[3] through migration, looks pretty plausible.

It is found in many sources that the names Patton, Patin, Patyn, Pattyn, Pattijn, Pattin, Patterson, Patun, Paton, Patisson, etc., come from a Norman derivative of Patrick. In West Flanders, when checking specific heraldic shields, there is a tendency to believe that Patin comes from Pat[4], and even Patin from 'skate.'

One is, therefore, not surprised to find a skate or a crane as symbols to represent such families. Nevertheless, as can be found in Part XV, and more precisely, the autosomal DNA results, genetic links to several Patton and Patterson families are evident because we probably share the same roots through this family line around 1000 years ago.

The name of the de Patin family has undergone several variations like most ancient names: Patin, Pattin, Pattyn, Pattijn, Patins and Pattyns or Pattijns. It is believed, however, that the original spelling was Patin or de Patin.

The origin of this family is primarily French, where the first documented members of this house are found towards the middle of the twelfth century, before the appearance of this name in the Annals of the History of Flanders. De Carpentier[5] relates the family to Raoul de Patin, governor of the castle of Cambrai and Cambresis, under the bishop Guillaume de Hainaut. Raoul's wife was Guyotte de Hames, described in Chapter 65.2.2 with Merovingian roots, among others, as outlined in the appendix, in Chapter 76 on page 1673.

The heraldic shield of the de Patin family that shows some resemblance with that of the author, although far from identical, is shown in Figure 65.4.

Raoul de Patin had married Guyote, the daughter of Autier de Hames, governor of Kortrijk, in 1272. De Carpentier also said that this house belonged to Wautier de Patin, a knight living in 1370, of which was born Jossin de Patin, wife of Heylaert, the lord of Moorslede, son of Jean, the lord of Moorslede, and Marguerite de Poucques, the daughter of Heylaert, Beer (Baron) de Poucques. Their son, Jean de Moorslede, captain of Ravenstein, married Philippine de Baenst. This Raoul de Patin, mentioned above, is the ancestor of Pierre de Patin, from whom we are sure of the further descendants.

Pierre de Patin (born in 1660), followed by Charles Philippe de Patin (born in 1687), François Guillaume de Patin (born in 1724), Jean Charles de Patin de Langemarck (born in 1757) and Joseph Felix de Patin (born in 1824). The British attempted its demolition on Monday, October 19, 1914 ('Schuwe Maandag' [a]), but they failed. The next day, it was turned to ashes by the Germans on the evening of October 20, 1914.*

[a] Schuwe Maandag appears in Chapter 48.9.5.4.5, Chapter 64.6.1.5.1, Chapter 64.7.1.6.7 and Chapter 65.

The de Patin family is ancient and noble de race, or noble race, comparable to the Desclergues, who are hidalgo de sangre.

The family de Patin has crossed the centuries with honor, and its alliances have always been illustrious. The family has rendered outstanding services to her country. Typically, the family appears among the noble families listed in numerous books in Flanders and Belgium.

Emiel Huys[6] describes the family 'De Patin (Pattyn),' having a weapon shield,

'in Azur, with a standing Crane, having a red beak and red legs, together with three shells in silver, namely two at the top and one at the bottom. The helmet is crowned, and on top, we find a swan breast between two golden wings.'

An illustration is shown in Figure 65.4.

According to Huys, the motto of de Patin is:

'Qu' oncques n' en a pati nocher crois !,' which is different from what we found in other sources, such as Carpentier, stating that it was initially 'Herselles'[7], Selles being the river running through Cambrai, shown in Figure 65.5.

The ancestry line of de Patin, illustrated in Figures 65.6, 65.7, and 65.9, described below is based on research done by the author in the Belgian Archives. Besides, and perhaps even more importantly, it is also based on several books, such as in Figures 65.10 and 65.10, and sources, some of which were found in numerous consulted sources, such as Emiel Huys[8], in which the ancestry is presented created by Mr Desideer-Pieter de Patin (Pattyn), Prost of Onze Lieve Vrouw van Blindekens in Bruges; Annuaire de la Noblesse de Belgique[9]; Annales de l' Académie d' Archeologie de Belgique[10]; Le Carpentier[11][12]; Gaillard[13]; de May[14]; la Cour Féodale de la Salle de Lille [15]; Epitaphiae Comitatus Flandria [16]; Koninklijke Bibliotheek te Brussel[17]; Du Mont[18]; Jan van Dadizeele[19]; Rijksarchief te Brugge[20][21]; Archief van het Bistdom te Brugge;[22] and Rijksarchief te Kortrijk.[23]

65.2 Raoul de Patin (DP01) & Guyotte de Hames

65.2.1 Raoul de Patin

He was the governor of Cambrai Castle and Cambrésis between 1292 and 1296 under Bishop Guillaume de Hainaut. He had married Guyote, daughter of Autier de Hames, the governor of Kortrijk, in 1272.

He was a Knight and appeared in documents in 1300 at Cambrai, France. To this house of de Patin also belonged Knight Wautier de Patin, still alive in 1370 whose daughter was Jossine de Patin, wife of Heylaert the Lord of Moorslede and son of Jean the Lord of Moorslede and Marguerite de Poucques, daughter of Baron de Poucques; their son was Jean de Moorslede, captain of Ravenstein and was married to Philippine de Baenst. The preference of later generations of the family of de Patin to spell their name in French, i.e., de Patin, and not according to local customs such as Pattyn, Pattyns, Pattijn, Patyn etc. stems from specific genealogical records of this particular family back to Cambrai, shown in Figure 65.12, in France around 1300 where the name was spelled Patin.

65.2.2 Guyotte de Hames

She was the daughter of Wautier de Hames, the governor of Kortrijk in 1272, and the wife of Raoul de Patin. Hames, or Haemes, is shown in Figure 65.8.

An appendix is devoted to Guyotte de Hames, who has a noble ancestry that includes, e.g., Merovingians. The reader is referred to Chapter 76 for more information.

65.2.3 Their descendants

65.2.4 Catherine de Patin & Jan van Dadizeele (van Veerdeghem)

Not a single genealogist has ever been able to prove, through documentation, if and how Catherine de Patin was related to the de Patin family we are describing here. Nevertheless, given her status and location, it is reasonable to assume that her father was Martin or Wautier de Patin (DP04) and her mother was Attente Peronne or that this couple was an uncle and auntie to her. She died early.

She was born in 1410 and married Jan (van Veerdeghem), Lord of Dadizele. She died in 1435. Jan van Dadizeele died on March 20, 1440. Their son was Jean Knight of Dadizelle[24], described in Chapter 65.2.5.

65.2.5 Jan van Dadizele & Catherine Breydel

He was the son of Catherine de Patin (DP04b2) and Jan van Dadizeele (van Veerdeghem). He is the famous Jan van Dadizele, known as Jan van Veerdeghem, who was murdered and is still buried in the Basilica of Dadizele. He was born in Dadizele on February 23, 1432; he was Councilor and Chamberlain Count of Flanders, Ghent's grand bailiff, and Flanders's sovereign bailiff in 1478. He defeated the French near Oudenaarde and was slaughtered in Antwerp on October 20, 1481, by the lord of Montigny. He was married to Catherine Breydel.

Jan van Dadizele and Catherine Breydel had the following children: Marie de Dadizele (1450), wife of Roger de Cordes; Catherine de Dadizele, a nun in Marquette; and Anne de Dadizele (1459), wife of Baudouin de la Woestine. The reader may be interested in further information given by Vegianos and Herkenrode[25] Jan van Dadizele's and Catherine Breydel's graves can be found in the Basilica of Dadizele and are shown in Figure 65.14.

Interestingly, the Basilica of Dadizele was reconstructed after WWI, and Theophile Verhaeghe, described in Chapter 48.9.2.2, was one of the entrepreneurs.

65.3 Richard de Patin (DP02)

He was the son of Raoul de Patin and the father of Pierre de Patin (DP03) and Wautier de Pain (DP03b).

65.3.1 Wautier de Patin or Gauthier de Patin (DP03b)

Wautier de Patin was a bailiff of Halewijn in 1403. He had a daughter, Helizoete, who married Rogier van Steelant, a knight and the lord of Lophem. Helizoete died in 1403 and was buried next to her husband at Lopem[26].

65.4 Pierre de Patin (DP03) & Mathilde

65.4.1 Pierre de Patin

He was a Squire and the grandson of Raoul de Patin and Guyotte de Hames. He has been cited in a 1389 document of the chamber of Lille (France). He was married to a particular Mathilde.

65.4.2 Mathilde

Her family name or other details are not known. She was married to Pierre de Patin.

65.4.3 Their Children

Pierre de Patin (DP03) and Mathilde had at least one child: Martin de Patin (DP04) or Wautier de Patin.

65.5 Martin or Wautier de Patin (DP04) & Attente Peronne

He was a contemporary of Bertrand Du Guesclin, the paternal ancestor of the Desclergues, described in Part VI. Martin or Wautier de Patin (DP04) was a son of Pierre de Patin (DP03) and Mathilde, and he had three children: Jean de Patin (DP05), Martin or Wautier de Patin (DP05b), and Jossine de Patin (DP05c). Wautier de Patin (DP04) appears in a document in 1370, where one can find that he was a Knight. His wife was Attente Peronne[27]. He was the provost of the manor of Quesmes in 1412. He died on July 23, 1445, and is buried at Halewijn in the Chapel of Saint Jacques. Wautier de Patin (DP04) had five children: Wautier de Patin (DP05b), Catherine de Patin (DP04b2), Jeanne de Patin (DP04b3), Josine de Patin (DP04b4) and Perchine de Patin (DP04b5). The descendants of Martin or Wautier de Patin (DP04) and Attente Peronne are given in Figure 65.15.

65.5.1 Wautier de Patin (DP05b) & Maria van der Gracht

He was a Knight and bailiff of the city of Menin from 1459 to 1460 and, according to other sources, even from 1414 until 1460. He married Maria van der Gracht, sister of Roland van der Gracht. Wautier de Patin (DP04b1) and Maria van der Gracht had three children: a son, Gilles de Patin (DP04b1y), a daughter, Josine de Patin (DP04b1x1), and a daughter, Marie de Patin (DP04b1x2).

65.5.1.1 Gilles de Patin (DP05by)

He was a Squire and was born at Menen, was the lord of Nedermoorschure and Legelant, and was a member of the Council of Flanders as advisor of Charles de Bold (Karel de Stoute), Duke of Burgundy, described in Chapter 8.5.4. On March 18, 1463, he married Josine van Halewijn and buried Ghent with his wife. He had a son, Roeland, who, in 1476, became a Priest of Royghem at Ghent.
Gilles de Patin (DP04b1y) died on September 16, 1479. Josine van Halewijn died on November 8, 1489. She was the daughter of Squire Wautier de Halewyn. Gilles de Patin had no children. The couple constituted a perpetual annuity favoring the Carthusian church near Ghent, where they were buried with an epitaph.

65.5.1.2 Marie de Patin (DP05bx)

She was alive in 1464 and died in 1479.

65.5.2 Josine de Patin (DP05c) & Heylaert van Moorslede

She was married to Heylaert, the Lord of Moorslede. Heylaert was a son of Jean Heylaert, Lord of Moorslede, and Marguerite de Poucques, daughter of Heylaert, the Baron of Poucques; their son Jean de Moorslede (DP04b1xy) was captain of Ravenstein and was married to Philippine de Baenst. They were buried in the chapel of Notre Dame at the parish church of Moorslede, shown in Figure 45.43, on page 826.
Heylaert of Moorslede is referred to as Eulard in Medard Van den Weghe' s work[28]. Heylaert married Josina de Patin, the daughter of Wautier, Knight, Bailiff of Menen, and Maria Vander Gracht. Their son was Jan, who married Philippina van Baenst, the daughter of Knight Roelandt. The couple had the following children: Wouter van Axelles, Philip, and Barbara (who died in 1541).
The Baenst family is very old and noble and comes from Cadzand. The family descends from Knight Wouter van Cadzand (1240). His weapons were,
'a black field, on which a silver bier, and on the top three silver blackbirds.'
The Van Baenst family from which Philippina van Baenst stems had the same coats of arms.
Heylaert sold the manor of Moorslede to Judocus de la Porte, whence the Lordship of Moorslede passed on to the noble family de la Porte.

65.6 Jean de Patin (DP05) & Jeanne van Lauwe de Lede

65.6.1 Jean de Patin

He was married to Jeanne van Lauwe de Lede. He was a Squire and the grandson of Wautier de Patin (DP03) and Attende Peronne. He was still alive in 1447 when he appeared with his wife before the magistrate of Kortrijk on August 17.

65.6.2 Jeanne van Lauwe de Lede

Jeanne van Lauwe de Lede was married to Jean de Patin and was still alive in 1449. She is the daughter of the Lord of Lauwe. It is interesting to note that the families of de Patin and van Lauwe are also mentioned in the work of Blieck Gilles,[29] which reads as follows:
'Finally, preserved from 1318, the city's accounts provide tangible proof of the importance of the work carried out during this period. Muted for the years between 1318 and 1331, they indicate that a portion of the proceeds from the tax on beverages is paid, from 1332 to 1339, to agents of the King responsible for completing the castle's construction. 1000 'livres parisis' (l.p.) of Flanders are delivered, in 1332, to Jean de Lauwe, lieutenant of the governor Renard de Choiseul, and Ferri de Denisy, squire of the Royal Castle, deputies by our King (sire) to perfect the castle of Lille. Further, 1000 l.p. was still paid in 1333, 940, 1334, 1000 again in 1335, then the sum was reduced to 800 l.p. in 1336, 1337 and 1338, to reach 200 L.p. in 1339 finally. An Act of November 26, 1339, confirms that the tax in question is now levied only for the benefit of the city, implicitly attesting to the completion of the work. A Bailiff of Lille, Douai, Tournaisis, governor of the borders of Flanders from 1327 to 1334, and possessing, as such, the entire administrative and military powers, Renard de Choiseul was certainly invested by Philippe VI of the responsibility of the building site, and in particular, the site's financing. This does not seem to have gone without causing difficulties. More than five years after his death in August 1340, his widow was forced to sell part of his property to pay to the widow of Jehan de Patin,[30] mason of the
